Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I can add anything in support of this amendment to what has been suggested here by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE]. It seems to me that the provision in this bill, which is sought to be stricken out, will, if retained, utterly and entirely fail to answer the very purposes for which it is advocated. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] has just stated that the States could avoid the burden of these taxes or, rather, the lessening of the value of their securities resulting therefrom by increasing the rate of interest. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] made it very clear in his remarks that this provision was not intended to apply to any bonds that are now outstanding. Therefore, it seems to me that the provision, if left in the bill, will really accomplish nothing. It seems to me that Congress is going out of its way to find an excuse to violate the Constitution which we have all taken a solemn oath to support. That the doctrine on principle cited by Gov. MONTAGUE, defining our country as "an indestructible Union of indestructible States" should have survived the greatest civil war in the history of the world, and having been sealed and cemented by the best blood of the Nation, North and South, it seems to me, might be accepted at least by the Congress of the United States in legislating upon so delicate a question as invading and seeking to take by taxation the instrumentalities of the States of this Union. It seems to me that we are treading upon not only dangerous ground but we are attempting to do a thing which every respectable court in this land has held time after time we can not lawfully do, and this talk of putting it up to the Supreme Court, it seems to me, is a cowardly evasion by Congress of its duty in the premises. The Members of Congress are under as much obligation to obey their oath of office as are the judges of the Supreme Court or any other officers of the Government. They take the most solemn oath of any officer of the Government to support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Apropos of the gentleman's remark about the oath, does a Member of Congress take an oath that he must sustain the Constitution of the United States save only so far as he desires to leave questions to the Supreme Court?

Mr. GORDON. Certainly not. There is no exception at all. The Supreme Court distinctly held when the question was fairly and squarely presented to it, that the Constitution of the United States was made for a time of war as well as a time of peace and gave the most excellent reasons for it and stated that any other doctrine would lead directly to anarchy and tyranny. It seems to me we ought not to retain such a provision in this bill.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I have no hesitancy in submitting this question to the Supreme Court of the United States. I have enough confidence in the Constitution of the United States and in the construction that the courts will place upon it to believe that this great Government has the right to defend itself in the hour of peril and to preserve its institutions. We are entering upon a miracle of finance. We propose to collect by this measure in a short period of time in three installments next year $8,000,000,000. In other words, we propose to collect by this bill $2,700,000,000 more dollars in the early summer of next year than there is of money in the United States. We propose to expend next year on this war a minimum sum of $24,000,000,000. We know it can not be less than that, and I believe, so far as I am concerned, it will be more than that. Take all the individual net incomes in the United States, including partnership incomes; take all the corporate net incomes in the United States, add them together, and take them all and appropriate them for carrying on this war and you will not have much more than half the money we propose to expend next year on this war. The only way we can carry on this war we know now is to borrow money, and the only way in which this great Government can borrow money is to make these bonds attractive, as attrative at least as the billions of municipal bonds in New York City and the other cities of the land—and most of these objections come from the cities of this land and from the coast cities of this land. If this war should fail on account of money, they would be scared to death in New York, in Boston, and in Philadelphia, where they are protesting now against taxing, they say, their securities. We are not taxing their securities by this bill. We are not seeking to do that; we are merely saying that those citizens who shall invest hereafter in municipal bonds shall account for the interest they receive on these bonds—on the future issues of these bonds—when they make up their income-tax returns. Is there anything wrong about that? Should the States of this Union, the cities of this Union, in their anxiety to extend their paving systems, to extend their sewerage systems, to improve and beautify their cities, should they be permitted to make their bonds so attractive that this great Republic can not sell its bonds on the market in order to carry on this war? We have been depending upon the patriotism of the people throughout the United States. We have been asking them to pay $100 for bonds they could go out on the market and buy for $96 and $97, and right gallantly they have responded so far. In the history of the world no patriotism like that exists. It is not too much now to ask these cities, which are about to issue their bonds, that they shall issue their bonds hereafter upon the understanding that we propose to require the purchasers of those bonds to account for the interest they receive on them when they pay their income taxes. If we can not do that, the time has come when we can not sell the bonds of this Government; and if we can not sell the bonds of our Government we have got to stop this war and submit to the kind of indemnity that may be imposed upon us. I deny that the Constitution of the United States is not in the hands of its friends here in the House of Representatives. Its friends are those who believe in preserving this country and its institutions. Its friends are those who believe that this great Government has a Constitution flexible enough to permit the Government to levy the taxes it ought to levy; to permit the Government to sell the bonds it must sell in order to preserve itself and keep its place in the sun. [Applause.]

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, there has been a great deal of discussion, or a great deal of argument, on the policy of this tax and its desirability. Now, I think that it may be desirable and may be a good policy at this time to tax everything that we can tax legally, but the question of desirability or the question of policy of a tax ought not to enter into consideration when we are discussing its validity; and the validity of the tax ought not to be overlooked, I think, simply because a tax may seem desirable or we may think in time of war it would be good policy. Now, I think the argument of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] is right as a legal proposition. I have no doubt at all, or have not had a serious doubt, that the Federal Government has no authority or right to tax bonds or securities of States or of their subordinate municipal corporations. I also have no doubt upon the other proposition discussed awhile ago, that the Congress has the right to levy an income tax upon the salaries of the Federal judges and the President without violating that clause of the Constitution which forbids the increasing or lowering of the salaries of such officials during their terms of office. The levying of an income tax, which is general in its terms and which would apply to the President and judges just the same as it would apply to the salaries or incomes of all other persons, would not amount to decreasing their salaries within the meaning of that provision of the Constitution. The income-tax amendment to the Constitution is very broad and allows taxes to be levied on incomes derived from any source whatsoever. And under that authority I think Congress can properly tax the incomes of the President and the judges, just the same as it can tax the salaries of any other persons. But to levy a Federal tax on the bonds and securities of the States and their subordinate municipalities presents an entirely different question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does not the gentleman remember that a short time ago we voted the entire resources of this country to the Commander in Chief to carry on this war, and now does he contend that, having done that, we can not use a little income from those resources?

Mr. DENISON. I think, of course, there are certain constitutional limitations. I do not think that just because we are at war we can therefore do everything we may want to do. Now, I do have a little doubt in my own mind on this proposition. I did not hear Gov. MONTAGUE in his first talk this afternoon, because I was not on the floor. I do not have any doubt at all on the legal proposition that the Federal Government has no right to tax the securities of the States and their subordinate municipalities. But I have wondered if, when this matter comes before the courts, they would not make a distinction between the power to tax such securities and the power to tax incomes arising from those securities after they get into the hands of individuals. I have some little doubt about that, and I would be glad to have the opinion of the gentleman from Virginia on that proposition; that is, whether or not there may be an important and logical distinction between the constitutional power to tax such securities themselves and the power to tax incomes arising from such securities in the hands of individuals.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I will.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I was just going to ask the gentleman whether he had in mind the fact that it was not a tax upon the bonds or on the income from the bonds specifically, but merely a tax on all incomes from any source whatever, and therefore does not come within the objection?

Mr. DENISON. That is just what I was discussing. There may be a logical distinction there which the courts will recognize; and if they should do so, then this provision of the bill might be held to be valid. There is some basis for the argument that a general income tax levied under the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution upon all incomes, from whatever source derived, including that derived from State and municipal bonds, would not amount to a tax on such bonds themselves, and therefore would not be so far inconsistent with or destructive of our dual form of sovereignty as to render it invalid. But I have no doubt on the other proposition, that the Federal Government has no authority to tax these securities as securities. That is what I mean.

Mr. GORDON. Now, if the Federal Government may, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] said, tax the income from these State and municipal securities 100 per cent and take all the income by taxes, which, of course, they may do, and you deprive the States of that income on their securities, do you not destroy the value of them?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. You can not levy a tax of 100 per cent without levying it upon all incomes, from whatever source.

Mr. GORDON. Oh, yes; we can.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. If you come and select these securities and put 100 per cent tax on them, it will be void.

Mr. DENISON. I think the tax would have to be general. But my doubt of the validity of this provision of the bill, in so far as it applies to State and municipal bonds, is so serious I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. LONDON and Mr. CANNON rose.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate close in five minutes, one minute to be occupied by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] and four minutes by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I took the floor just to attract the attention of this Congress, of the country, and of the city of New York, to the fact that, in spite of the fact that the mayor of the city of New York has asked every Member of Congress from the State of New York to seriously contest this provision in the bill, that the only Member of Congress representing the State of New York on the floor of this Congress is the Socialist Member. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, the reason why the mayor of New York no doubt asks for this is that the debt of New York City is $1,500,000,000. How marvelously she has grown, and how expensive it is to conduct the affairs of that great city! And that is measurably true of the other cities, to say nothing about the counties, and so forth.

Now, then, there is pending in the State of Illinois a proposition submitted by the legislature to legalize the issuing of $60,000,000 for the construction of good roads. And, God knows, if there is any State that needs good roads it is Illinois. We vote on the question in November.

Now, they are afraid that this may impair the placing of other bonds. Possibly it may. Possibly Illinois may be wise enough when she enacts that legislation, if it is authorized, to defer the issue of the bonds until a little later on, until after the war closes, perchance, in order that she may decrease the rate of interest to a reasonable amount, so that she can get par for them. We are running up against the $60,000,000 proposition in Illinois. Now, what is to happen? Some of these States and some of these cities must issue bonds or else suffer severely.

It is perfectly clear to my mind that under the Constitution and under the decisions of the courts we have no right—the Federal Government has no right—to tax them. But suppose those bonds go upon the market. They sell at a depreciated price, and the man who understands about what the Constitution is and what it provides, and what the decisions of the courts have been and what they will be, will buy them, and then contest it, don't you know, and after all "that damned old plutocrat" who takes the chances will be sworn at when he takes his profit. [Applause.]

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a suggestion. While I do not want to take away from my colleague [Mr. LONDON], the Socialist Member from New York City, any credit that belongs to him for responding to the appeal of the mayor of the city of New York, he is mistaken when he says he is the only Member from New York favoring this amendment.

Mr. LONDON. I said "the only one present."

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. Very well. I am a Member from New York City.

Mr. LONDON. Is there any other Member?

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. Bronx County is the best part of New York City, and I represent one-half of Bronx County. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. KITCHIN. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 48.

Mr. PENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are demanded.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York raises the point of no quorum. The Chair will count.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman insist upon his point of no quorum?

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. Yes. I think this is too important a matter to vote on with so few Members present.

Mr. KITCHIN. All right. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ROSE, for 3 days, on account of important business;

To Mr. BRAND, for 10 days, on account of sickness; and

To Mr. ASHBROOK, for 3 days, on account of important business.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 12098. An act to protect the lives and health and morals of women and minor workers in the District of Columbia, and to establish a minimum-wage board and define its powers and duties, and to provide for the fixing of minimum wages for such workers, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 44 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, September 17, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimate of appropriation for repairing Chicago (Ill.) post office, for inclusion in some appropriation bill (H. Doc. No. 1279); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting draft of proposed bill to permit free entry into the United States of all material and articles imported for the use and by order of the War Department during the existing war and for other purposes (H. Doc. No. 1280); to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8473) for the relief of Thomas H. Rockwell, deceased, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 782), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII,

Mr. PADGETT introduced a bill (H. R. 12945) providing for the purchase of uniforms, accouterments, and equipment by officers of the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, and midshipmen at the Naval Academy from the Government at cost, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. KRAUS: A bill (H. R. 12946) granting an increase of pension to Agustus Geer; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LUFKIN: A bill (H. R. 12947) granting a pension to Mary E. Hiller; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12948) granting an increase of pension to Emma A. Hobbs; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12949) granting a pension to Mary A. G. Robinson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. McARTHUR: A bill (H. R. 12950) granting a pension to Elijah Clark Hall; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12951) granting an increase of pension to Colonel F. Bond; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MAPES: A bill (H. R. 12952) granting a pension to Franklin Tubbs; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. O'SHAUNESSY: A bill (H. R. 12953) granting an increase of pension to George W. Dean; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12954) granting an increase of pension to Andrew J. Allen; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SANDERS of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 12955) granting a pension to Martin L. Stokesberry; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12956) granting an increase of pension to James R. Beaty; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12957) granting a pension to Mary St. Clair; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12958) granting a pension to Clem S. Kirkham; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHOUSE: A bill (H. R. 12959) granting an increase of pension to Reason Walker; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ELSTON: Petition of the department of health and recreation, women's committee, Councils of National and State Defense, of Oakland, Cal., favoring war-time prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts: Petition of Charles M. Blodgett, mayor of Malden, Mass., and 287 others, residents in said Malden and the city of Everett, Mass., for national legislation to commission pharmacists in the United States service, so that men in the service shall receive the same skilled pharmaceutical service that they receive in civil life; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LINTHICUM: Petitions of the Baltimore Bargain House, Armstrong, Cator & Co., and Johnson, Boyd & Co., all of Baltimore, Md., favoring some protective clause in the new tax bill relative to inventory of merchandise; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. McARTHUR: Resolutions of the Association of Fathers of Soldiers and Sailors of the United States of America, of Portland, Oreg., urging the nationalization of the public schools of the country so as to provide for the training of returned soldiers and sailors; to the Committee on Education.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, September 17, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come before Thee with our cause, a cause that does not speak behind the closed doors of secret diplomacy but that has its voice in the indignation of millions against wrong and in a will to conquer in the name of humanity. We ask the divine guidance and blessing as we begin the tasks to which Thy providence has called us. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Friday, September 13, 1918, when, on request of Mr. LODGE and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

SENATOR FROM KENTUCKY.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, I have here the certificate of appointment of Hon. GEORGE B. MARTIN, of Kentucky, by the governor, as a Senator to fill the vacancy in the unexpired term of the late Senator JAMES. The newly appointed Senator is on the floor and ready to take the oath.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the credentials.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

This is to certify that, pursuant to the power vested in me by the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the State of Kentucky, I, A. O. Stanley, the governor of said State, do hereby appoint GEORGE B. MARTIN a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States to fill the vacancy therein caused by the death of OLLIE M. JAMES, as provided by law.

Witness his excellency our governor, A. O. Stanley, and our seal hereto affixed at Frankfort, Ky., this 7th day of September, A. D. 1918.

A. O. STANLEY,
Governor.

By the governor:
[SEAL.]

JAMES P. LEWIS,
Secretary of State,
By E. MATT KARR,
Assistant Secretary of State.

In the name and by the authority of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, A. O. Stanley, governor of said Commonwealth, to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Know ye, that GEORGE B. MARTIN, having been duly appointed United States Senator, I hereby invest him with full power and authority to execute and discharge the duties of the said office according to law, and to have and to hold the same, with all the rights and emoluments thereunto legally appertaining for and during the term prescribed by law.

In testimony whereof I have caused these letters to be made patent and the seal of the Commonwealth to be hereunto affixed. Done at Frankfort the 7th day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and eighteen and in the one hundred and twenty-sixth year of the Commonwealth.

A. O. STANLEY.

By the governor:
[SEAL.]

JAMES P. LEWIS,
Secretary of State,
By E. MATT KARR,
Assistant Secretary of State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the newly appointed Senator will present himself at the desk for the purpose of taking the oath of office.

Mr. MARTIN was escorted to the Vice President's desk by Mr. BECKHAM; and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

STREET CAR SERVICE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the chairman of the Public Utilities Commission of the District of Columbia, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 9th instant, a supplemental report of that commission relative to the purchase of new street railway cars in the District of Columbia. The report will lie on the table for the present, to accompany the report heretofore received.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 12923) to supplement the second liberty-bond act, as amended, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 8004. An act authorizing the resurvey or retracement of lands heretofore returned as surveyed public lands of the United States under certain conditions; and

H. R. 12098. An act to protect the lives and health and morals of women and minor workers in the District of Columbia, and to establish a minimum-wage board and define its powers and duties, and to provide for the fixing of minimum wages for such workers, and for other purposes.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of sundry citizens of Grand Rapids, Mich., praying for the passage of the so-called child-labor law, providing for the protection of minor children, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of the Laac Drug Co., of Mankato, Minn., praying that alcohol used for medical purposes be exempted by the proposed increased revenue tax, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Stanley Shoe Co., of St. Paul, Minn., remonstrating against the proposed increased tax on high-priced shoes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the League of Minnesota Municipalities, of Rochester, Minn., remonstrating against the proposed tax on municipal bonds, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from John C. Sweet, of Minneapolis, Minn., remonstrating against the proposed increased tax on amusement admissions, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the Warner Hardware Co., of Minneapolis, Minn., remonstrating against the proposed increased tax on firearms, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of Dr. I. B. Kenney, of Eagle Bend, Minn., remonstrating against the proposed increased tax on amusement admissions, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a communication from the Russell Grader Manufacturing Co., of Minneapolis, Minn., relative to the alleged increase in advertising expenditures by various industries since the beginning of the war, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the State Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Minnesota, praying for speedy action on the woman-suffrage amendment, which was ordered to lie on the table.

PAN AMERICANISM.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I present a communication from the Anti-Imperialist League, touching upon the subject of Pan Americanism, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ANTI-IMPERIALIST LEAGUE,
September 5, 1918.

To the honorable Senate of the United States:

The Anti-Imperialist League ventures respectfully to add its testimony to that which it is believed will be given as occasion offers by general public opinion in support of all the approach which has been made by the present administration to Pan Americanism in opposition to jealousies, to selfish interests, and to the hindrances created and maintained by the common enemy. The policy may be considered as established by the elder in the brotherhood of American Republics.

The aid and sympathy was most praiseworthy given in 1907 to the foundation of the Central American court of justice. It resulted directly from a conference held in Washington by the representatives of the five Central American Republics—Nicaragua, Honduras, Salvador, Costa Rica, and Panama—by invitation and with the moral participation of the United States. The life of this court, fixed at 10 years, which has thus expired was to be renewed by a new Central American conference.

1. It is the earnest prayer of the Anti-Imperialist League that steps may be taken immediately to prepare the way for this conference and for the renewal of the court which had proved its value in many cases where its wise and fair judgments had been accepted unhesitatingly, and had obviously saved these century-agitated States from menacing disturbances, foreign and domestic. It would be an especially desirable, because magnanimous, movement on the part of the United States, since its present inertia may perhaps be attributed to the fact that a verdict was given by this court against the contention of Nicaragua authorized, as it were, by the treaty made by the United States with Nicaragua—that it had the right to concede to us the command of the Bay of Fonseca, without considering the claims of the other riparian States of the bay and of the San Juan River.

2. It is also the prayer of the league that this treaty with Nicaragua may be modified in accordance with right and justice, now so apparent, apart from any judicial decision, in behalf of the claims of Honduras, Salvador, and Costa Rica.

3. As delay has been attributed to the fact that there have been difficulties in the way of recognition of the Government now in control of Costa Rica, it is urged that by diplomatic and senatorial action these difficulties may be removed and harmony established with the country, which should be facilitated by her declaration of war against Germany.

Cooperation and sympathy would have been confidently sought in this petition from the Pan American Union, but the matter is urgent and directorate of the union does not meet until November.

THE ANTI-IMPERIALIST LEAGUE,
M. STOREY, President.
ERVING WINSLOW, Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF AERONAUTICS.

Mr. NEW, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4852) to create an executive department in the Government, to be known as the department of aeronautics, and for the appointment of a secretary of aeronautics and an assistant secretary, and providing for appropriations for said department, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 570) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SHIELDS:

A bill (S. 4928) granting an increase of pension to John B. Haley (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 4929) granting a pension to Robert L. Zell (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 4930) granting a pension to Fred W. McMeen; to the Committee on Pensions.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

Mr. THOMAS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1419) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

An act (H. R. 12923) to supplement the second liberty bond act, as amended, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

GIFT OF THE GOVERNMENT OF FRANCE.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, from the Committee on Foreign Relations I present a resolution under its instructions, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, presents a resolution, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 305), as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States has received with deep satisfaction the communication of the ambassador of the French Republic to the United States conveying the desire of the French Government to present to the Senate a vase from the national manufacturer of Sevres.

Resolved, That this offer is accepted with the highest appreciation of the gift and of the spirit in which it is presented, and that the 24th day of September, 1918, at the hour of 1 o'clock p. m., is hereby set apart for the purpose of formally and officially accepting such gift.

Resolved, That the French ambassador be notified of this action of the Senate and requested to attend as the representative of his Government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and unanimously agreed to.

GERMAN PEACE PROPAGANDA.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to present an article which appeared in the London Quarterly of June on the German peace propaganda. I am sure it will be of great value to every Member of the Senate, because it gives a view of the immense extent of German propaganda activities which I have not seen so well and fully summarized anywhere else.

If I may have the permission of the Senate for a few moments I should like to call attention to this matter of the German propaganda. Speaking on the 23d of August I said that we must be prepared for German peace propaganda. It was an easy prediction to make and one certain of fulfillment.

I have been watching from day to day and have noted some of the movements. For instance, September 6 an article with headlines stated that Mr. Troelstra, a leading Dutch Socialist, of whom I never heard before, had come out with a strong argument in favor of peace, undoubtedly, as suggested in the article, because he is a German agent, and yet that rubbish is given considerable space, for what reason I can not divine.

Then comes Count Czernin, the former prime minister of Austria, on the 9th of September, and he, a Berlin mouthpiece, puts out a statement in favor of peace. That, too, is given newspaper space, and should have none. What he says is wholly unimportant except as an aid to Germany.

Then comes Baron Burian, who is the present prime minister of Austria, and he comes out with an argument, and also one from Michael Karoly, president of the Hungarian Independent Party, and to them a column and a half is given, all leading in the same direction and all harmful.

Mr. President, those are only a few of the more obvious efforts at peace propaganda coming from Europe. There are others nearer home—furtive, subtle, and dangerous. A few days ago—Senators must have seen it noted in the newspapers—there appeared a large work called Two Thousand Questions and Answers About the War. It had a commendatory introduction from Mr. George Creel. It turned out on examination that the book was full of direct German propaganda. Mr. Creel retracted his approval and made an explanation which amounted to saying that he had not read the book and did not know anything about it when he recommended it to the public. I am going to print some extracts from that book without reading them at this point, so that Senators may see just what the character of the book is. Here you will find German propaganda of the worst and most insidious kind put into a book of this sort, and the authors managed to get an indorsement from Mr. Creel, who is the head of our Bureau of Information and who undertakes to play the part of a censor, one rather dull of vision, apparently, where pacificism and German propaganda are concerned. I will print these extracts with his letter of apology and explanation if I may be permitted to do so.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator under what authority was that book compiled?

Mr. LODGE. The book was published by Doran & Co., who have now withdrawn it, but I do not know who compiled the book. Apparently, Mr. Creel approved it on the word of Mr. Albert Shaw, of the Review of Reviews. It appears to be an anonymous compilation, as I see it stated here.

Mr. POMERENE. Is the Senator able to state who paid the expenses of the publication?

Mr. LODGE. I am not. It came out through a well-known publishing house. I print this because I want Senators to see what is in that book. What I am trying to show is the extent of German propaganda and how we need to be on the lookout for it, because it is all directed toward a compromise German peace.

Mr THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. My information is that the book to which the Senator refers was either compiled by or under the supervision of Dr. Albert Shaw, the editor of Review of Reviews. I can not vouch for the correctness of that impression.

Mr. LODGE. It was on the faith of what Dr. Shaw said that Mr. Creel, as announced in his letter, gave his letter of commendation.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. Without endeavoring at all to extenuate the offense of Mr. Creel in giving his indorsement, I think it is just to state that the publication of the book was afterwards suppressed on the report made by the Bureau of Information.

Mr. LODGE. I have already stated that. It was surpressed, if at all, on the report of Dr. Van Tyne, of the National Security League.

Mr. WALSH. I did not hear the Senator so state.

Mr. LODGE. The publishers are reported to have withdrawn it. I am printing Mr. Creel's own letter so that he may do himself entire justice, if he is satisfied with the letter.

Mr. REED. May I ask the Senator if Mr. Creel has ever yet taken the American people into his confidence enough to tell them who the disloyal author of this disloyal work actually is?

Mr. LODGE. He has not, Mr. President, and I do not undertake to read Mr. Creel's mind.

It moves in a mysterious way
Its wonders to perform.

Mr. REED. I want to suggest, in view of the fact that it is admitted that the work is disloyal, so disloyal that it has been called in and suppressed——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Creel admits it.

Mr. REED. I was curious to know why, as he vouched for this work and must know its author, he has not as yet turned that disloyal author over to the Department of Justice.

Mr. LODGE. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. President, on September 1, there was published, and I give the statement as it appeared in the New York Times, an order from the Secretary of War, excluding from soldiers' libraries and from camps certain books. The Secretary was entirely right, and it was a most excellent and commendable order in every way. I will print the list here. [See appendix.] So far as I know from the authors these books thus put under the ban are as thoroughly mischief-making as anything that can be imagined.

I will read the titles and authors of a few examples of these books that were finding their way into our camps and soldiers' libraries: Prison Memoirs of an Anarchist, by Alexander Berkman, who is now serving time, having been convicted of obstructing the draft.

Another book by Scott Nearing, who was indicted for conspiring to obstruct the draft.

A book by Hugo Muensterberg—of course, a representative of Germany.

A book by Prof. Burgess, well known as a German advocate.

A book by George Sylvester Viereck, formerly the editor of the Fatherland.

Mr. President, nothing could be more commendable or praiseworthy than the order of the Secretary of War.

The American Library Association, who are charged with this work, undertook to make an explanation in defense which, I think, is a very unsatisfactory one; but after strongly praising themselves, no doubt deservedly, they admit that there have been instances in which pamphlets of a seditious or pacifist nature have been surreptitiously placed upon the shelves of the libraries without the knowledge of the librarian.

Who is putting these books into the soldiers' libraries and into the camps—books which the Secretary of War has forbidden? Would it not be worth while to look them up? This enginery of German propaganda, this wide-flung network of poisonous doctrine, is reaching even into our camps and into the reading matter that is furnished to our soldiers.

Let me give another illustration to show how far this cunning, furtive propaganda has gone. Here is a book that the Secretary's list excluded. It is entitled "Why War?" It is written by Frederic C. Howe. I have not examined the book. I understand that it treats the war as caused by and directed to a settlement of certain economic questions. My attention, however, has been called to an article by Mr. Howe, published in Harper's Magazine, April, 1918, after we had been at war for a year. This article deals with the war as if we were engaged in it for some economic advantages, as if that was all which was at stake in this war. What a monstrous idea—that we should be sending our youth to be killed in France to get a trade advantage somewhere, and that economic questions are all that is involved! If this Congress and the President had gone to war on such grounds it would have been a crime. To put out such deleterious stuff as this seems intolerable, and it is by the author of one of the many books that the Secretary of War has so wisely excluded. I read one paragraph from Mr. Howe's article. He says:

Finally, Germany must be given the same economic assurance. Her railroad routes from Constantinople to Bagdad must be free from military menace by other nations. Her concessions, privileges, and rights in Turkey and Asia Minor, as well as her water communications through the Mediterranean, must be free from any fear of military interruption.

Are we in this war to see that Germany can build herself up in the East by the Bagdad Railroad and that she is protected in her trade rights in the Mediterranean? We are in this war to prevent her from ever again having the strength to break out on the world. Under no circumstances must she have again the Bagdad Railroad or a route from Hamburg to the Persian Gulf, and only such rights in the Mediterranean as the civilization which she has outraged and tried to ruin sees fit to give her.

But there is Mr. Howe's pleasing proposition. Let me read in contrast what the President said in his speech at Baltimore on this very point to show how he regards that question in the East. He said:

Their purpose—

Referring, of course, to the Germans—

is undoubtedly to make all the Slavic peoples, all the free and ambitious nations of the Baltic Peninsula, all the lands that Turkey has dominated and misruled, subject to their will and ambition and build upon that dominion an empire of force upon which they fancy that they can then erect an empire of gain and commercial supremacy, an empire as hostile to the Americas as to the Europe which it will overawe, an empire which will ultimately master Persia, India, and the peoples of the Far East.

There is the statement of the President's attitude and policy contrasted with the dangerous doctrine I have just read. In that same speech in Baltimore the President further says:

There is therefore, but one response possible from us: Force, force to the utmost, force without stint or limit, the righteous and triumphant force which shall make right the law of the world, and cast every selfish dominion down in the dust.

"Selfish dominion," I suggest to Mr. Howe, refers to the Germany whose Bagdad Railway and Mediterranean trade routes he wishes us to guard and preserve.

This writer, whose books were excluded from the camps on September 1 by the order of the Secretary of War, from whose article I have read an extract to the Senate, is, according to this Times list, the commissioner of immigration at the port of New York, holding a great and important office under this administration, when he is engaged in publishing stuff like this in flagrant contravention of the policy laid down by the President.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I was not in when the Senator took the floor, and he may have done so; if not, I would suggest in this connection that it would be extremely appropriate to read also the announcement of the President yesterday.

Mr. LODGE. I am coming to that. I do not propose to overlook it.

Mr. THOMAS. I must apologize to the Senator because I was tardy in coming to the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I was showing how far this German propaganda extends, how subtle, how pervasive it is, how you find it even among officers of the Government, find it in the libraries of our soldiers, find it everywhere.

Now, Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. Before the Senator proceeds with his argument can he give the date when the order was issued by the Secretary of War excluding these publications?

Mr. LODGE. I thought I did. September 1 of this month.

Mr. POMERENE. Possibly the Senator did, but I overlooked it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, of course the general official propaganda in Europe to which I have referred developed into speeches from the Kaiser which contained that mixture of truculence, turgidity, and whimpering of which he is a master, all connected with references to God; and of all his unattractive qualities I think his religious hypocrisy is perhaps the most odious and revolting. He winds up yesterday with a proposition to Belgium. There is no wrong, no injury, no cruelty which he has spared that gallant and unhappy country, and now he insults them with a proposition for a separate peace.

This is followed by the Austrian note, of which I will only ask to print their substantive proposal in brief, which is this:

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY'S PROPOSAL FOR PEACE DISCUSSION IN BRIEF.

The Royal and Imperial Government would like, therefore, to propose to the Governments of all the belligerent States to send delegates to a confidential and unbinding discussion of the basic principles for the conclusion of peace, in a place in a neutral country and at a near date that would yet have to be agreed upon, delegates who were charged to make known to one another the conception of their Governments regarding those principles and to receive analogous communications, as well as to request and give frank and candid explanations on all those points which need to be precisely defined.

Of course, the signers of the note are in Vienna, but the voice that dictates the words is the voice of Berlin. Think of that Austro-Hungarian proposition in the face of the action of the President—one of the most commendable and admirable things that has been done yet in this war—his recognition of the Czecho-Slovaks as a belligerent nation.

The soldiers of that people—a hundred thousand prisoners—were allowed by the Bolsheviki a free passage to France with their arms. Then, of course, the Bolsheviki broke the promise and undertook to disarm them. We all know what happened, a wonderful history; there has been nothing like it in all the past except the famous march of the 10,000 Greeks. When the Bolsheviki attempted to take their arms from them they proceeded to fight; they defeated the people who tried to stop their way, and they took town after town. Now they are backed up by allied forces from the United States, from Japan, from England, and from France. They have brought habitable Siberia, that vast country, very nearly under their control—a great feat. If any nation ever deserved recognition as a belligerent, it is the Czecho-Slovaks.

But, Mr. President, it can not stop there; it will not stop there. We must recognize the Jugo-Slavs, at the head of whom stands Serbia, which has suffered more than any other country in this war, with the sole exception of Belgium. We must also recognize the Poles, one of the greatest and most brilliant people of history. They alone can make a great and powerful State in Central Europe, which will forever bar the eastern movement of Germany. That is coming; that is involved in the recognition of the Jugo-Slavs.

What does all this mean? It means that when the President recognized the Czecho-Slovaks as a belligerent nation he set his hand irrevocably to a document which meant the dissolution of the Austrian Empire—"a consummation devoutly to be wished." If Bohemia is to be independent, the most important part, economically and industrially, of Austria is taken away. But it must not stop there. The Slav races, 26,000,000 of whom Austria holds and holds oppressively, must be set free and given independence; and the President has entered upon that great policy, most wisely, as I believe.

Now, Mr. President, we come to the President's reply to Austria, the President's quick answer, which appeared in the newspapers this morning, as follows:

The Government of the United States feels that there is only one reply which it can make to the suggestion of the Imperial Austro-Hungarian Government. It has repeatedly and with entire candor stated the terms upon which the United States would consider peace and can and will entertain no proposal for a conference upon a matter concerning which it has made its position and purpose so plain.

The President's reply to this stupid note—for it does not deserve to be characterized in any other way—will meet, I am sure, with universal approval. His prompt and curt refusal of the Austro-Hungarian proposal was not only right but wise, for it will, I believe, put an end to loose and feeble talk about these Austro-Hungarian offers—a kind of talk which is not only debilitating and confusing, but distinctly helpful to Germany. The President, without entering upon any precise details or definitions, says the position and purpose of the United States are plain. I, too, think that the purpose and position of the American people are plain and growing plainer, clearer, and stronger every day. They are becoming so plain that I think even the central powers will soon begin to understand them. I believe that they will learn, and the sooner the better, that the American people mean to have complete victory. They must be made to know that we have no intention of arguing with them about terms of peace around a table. When Prussian militarism is crushed and the Germans throw up their hands, then the United States and her allies will tell them the terms of peace which they are to accept. In no other way can the world be made safe against German wars of conquest. In no other way can we justify our entrance into the war and our sacrifice of our best and bravest. Until complete victory is reached on German soil any negotiations or discussions with our enemies would mean that the war was lost, our sacrifices in vain, and our high purposes defeated. There is much hard fighting yet to be done, many sacrifices still to be made, but the light of victory is shining upon our armies and upon those of our allies.

The men who wear your uniform and carry your colors mean to go to Berlin; they mean to have a complete victory and a binding peace, and the country is behind them and with them. We shall press on until the only end worthy of attainment is fully reached. Germany has brought unnumbered woes upon an innocent world. She must be put in a position where she can not strike again. She has appealed, in the lust of conquest, to the dread arbitrament of arms. By that she must abide. She shall not now resort to talk and bargain for a decision. We mean to put her in physical bonds. We mean to make the world safe for all free, law-abiding, decent people so that they may live their lives in peace, unthreatened, and unalarmed. For this we fight. We shall not ask more. We shall never accept less.

I ask that the article from the Living Age, entitled "German Propagandist Societies," may be printed as a public document instead of in the RECORD. It is very short.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection it is so ordered. (S. Doc. No. 278.)

APPENDIX.

PUBLISHERS SUPPRESS AS PRO-GERMAN NEW WAR BOOK—HEAD OF COMMITTEE OF PUBLIC INFORMATION ONLY SPONSOR APPEARING IN CONDEMNED VOLUME.

NEW YORK, September —.

"Two Thousand Questions and Answers About the War," an anonymous compilation of alleged authentic information about the war and its causes, prefaced with an introduction by George Creel, chairman of the Committee on Public Information, has been withdrawn from sale by its publishers, George H. Doran Co., by arrangement with the Review of Reviews Co.

PRO-GERMAN MASTERPIECE.

Dr. Claude H. Van Tyne, head of the department of history in the University of Michigan, who is now serving as editorial director of the National Security League's bureau of patriotism through education, in an exhaustive report on the book and its contents submitted to the league's executive committee says:

"In my opinion, it is a masterpiece of pro-German propaganda. The German Government could not have devised anything more insidious, more calculated to destroy our faith in our allies, and to insinuate into the American mind excuses for Germany.

"No author's name is given, so that no one else is responsible but the writer of the introduction."

The introduction was written by George Creel, chairman of the Committet on Public Information, who says of the book:

CREEL'S INDORSEMENT.

"Such volumes as this 'Two Thousand Questions and Answers About the War' are the textbooks with which we shall have to begin. It gives the background of difficulties out of which the war arose. It relates the development and progress of the conflict that widened to include us as the aims of the great imperial enemy of our peaceful civilization developed and progressed. It indicates the necessary basis for a permanent settlement of the terrible dispute.

"In other countries, where the policy of the nation has been in the hands of a governing class, such knowledge can be left to the officers of administration and the legislative advisers who control them.

"Here it must be the possession of the whole people, in order that we may be able successfully to carry out President Wilson's famous aim 'to make the world safe for democracy.'

"This war will not be won until it becomes part and parcel of every individual life, until it dominates every thought and activity. This burning consciousness can be gained only through an exact knowledge of the facts in the case, for it is in the simplicities of truth that America and the great liberal nations find fullest justification. The Two Thousand Questions and Answers, in my opinion, constitute a vital part of the national defense."

DR. VAN TYNE'S REPORT.

Dr. Van Tyne's report reads in full:

"The title of a war book of 352 pages is Two Thousand Questions and Answers About the War, published by George H. Doran Co., by arrangement with the Reviews of Reviews Co., with an introduction by George Creel. No author's name is given, so that no one else is responsible but the writer of the introduction.

"In his introduction Mr. Creel says:

"'The Two Thousand Questions and Answers, in my opinion, constitute a vital part of the national defense.'

"MENACE TO MORALE.

"My own opinion is that the Two Thousand Questions and Answers is a masterpiece of pro-German propaganda. The German Government could not have devised anything more insidious, more calculated to destroy our faith in our allies, and to insinuate into the American mind excuses for Germany. No one question or answer is so outrageous, but a subtle vein of disparagement of the high principles for which the allies fight runs through it all. Indorsed by the chairman of the Committee on Public Information (established by order of the President Apr. 14, 1917), it became a menace to the American morale.

"The following selected quotations—only a fraction of the many dubious items in the book—will show to any loyal American the dangerous quality of this work (the pages are given in each case):

SLUR ON ALLIES.

"P. 1. Q. Do the best informed students of world politics feel that the war could have been avoided?

"A. The war at first appeared to be the result of Germany's determination to grasp and make secure her 'place in the sun' along lines quite similar to those upon which in the past had been built the British Empire, the French Colonial Empire, and the tremendous Russian expansion."

(Note the slur on the British and French.)

"P. 2. Q. What was the German demand for 'a place in the sun'?

* * * * * * *

"Q. Why did this natural desire become dangerous to world peace?

"A. Because 'places in the sun' were pretty well occupied. 'Places in the sun' were mostly colonial, of course, and other nations already had the best colonies.

SEA CONTROL.

"P. 2. Q. What were the great specific prewar rivalries?

* * * * * * *

"A. (3) British control of the world sea, which bound a huge part of the world together as 'the British Empire' (the all-red belt around the earth, as shown on British postage stamps) and the consequent control of nearly the whole colonial area of earth."

(With whom are the sympathies of an uninformed reader likely to be after reading these last two items?)

"P. 4. Q. Just what did the Italian Irredentists desire?

"Q. Were all these Provinces under Austria?

"A. Most of them were, but at one time (though little has been heard of this lately) Italian Irredentism was directed also against the French possession of the stretch of Mediterranean coast that includes the city of Nice."

(Note the slur on France.)

MUCH ALIKE.

"P. 7. Q. Just what classes in Germany and Great Britain give support to these theories? (I. e., imperialistic theories.)

"A. All classes, when the originators of the movements succeed in presenting some particularly powerful reason; but if the question means what classes are by nature and thought supporters of these policies, the answer may be that just as the two policies were much alike, despite the fact that they have caused war, so their protagonists in both nations were much alike, despite the fact that they so bitterly condemn each other."

"P. 22. Q. Did not France obtain this also? (i. e., Alsace.)

"A. Yes. In the seventeenth century Louis XIV made his famous stroke for the seizure of Holland, and in the ensuing conflict between France and the German Emperor a great part of Alsace and Lorraine, still remaining German, was overrun by the French.

* * * * * * *

"This is the war that German history dubs the 'Raubkreig' (robber-war).

GERMANY LIBERAL!

"P. 23. Q. Has Germany treated the Provinces as conquered territory?

* * * * * * *

"A. Apparently the purely militaristic part of German Government in Alsace and Lorraine is what has caused most of the mischief. * * * As against this it seems fair to say that the actual political laws for Alsace-Lorraine were reasonably liberal."

(Read Prof. Hazen on Alsace-Lorraine as an answer to this assertion.)

"P. 23. Q. Do the people (of Alsace-Lorraine) now speak French or German?

"A. About 85 per cent speak German. The rest speak French or a French patois. * * * All these people, however, with the exception of the small percentage of illiterates, can speak, read, and write their national language."

(Nothing said about the way they have been forced to speak German.)

INCLUSION IN GERMANY.

"P. 24. Q. How would the people of Alsace-Lorraine vote in a plebiscite?

"A. The Encyclopedia Brittanica, 1910, eleventh edition, Cambridge, England, leans to the opinion that they would wish to remain German. * * * Sir Harry H. Johnston, the well-known British colonial official, wrote in the English Nineteenth Century Magazine: 'If a plebiscite were called, absolutely uncontrolled by government officials, it would probably be found that there was an overwhelming majority of votes in * * * Alsace-Lorraine for inclusion within the German Empire.'"

(No allusion to the question of moral right, to the French spirit and character of the people, to the outraged pride of the French people at having this territory torn from France.)

"P. 24. Q. Apart from French leanings, what rule do the Alsace-Lorrainians want?

"A. The people want to free themselves from the status of being mere inhabitants of a Reichsland. They want to become a rightful political entity. Apparently the chief political thought of the Provinces (viewing simply the relations to the German Empire) is not toward erection of Alsace-Lorraine into a separate German State.

"The people of Lorraine appear to favor inclusion in the Bavarian Rhine Province adjacent to them; and the Alsatians appear to lean toward incorporation with Baden."

(Note the plain insinuation that the people of Alsace-Lorraine desire only a different status in the German Empire, not return to France.)

"LUSITANIA" WARNING.

"P. 36. Q. Did the German embassy issue a warning to passengers on the Lusitania?

"A. The following advertisement appeared in the New York World and the New York Times May 1, 1915, seven days before the sinking of the Lusitania (quoted in full).

"P. 36. Q. Did Germany offer indemnity for Americans lost on the Lusitania?

"A. Yes; while negotiations over the Lusitania case were still pending she stated her willingness to pay indemnity for the deaths of Americans."

(Nothing but these two items about this matter. No comment on the moral aspects of the affair.)

SLUR ON ENGLAND.

"P. 173. Q. How did England acquire India after ousting the French?

"A. Slowly, steadily, by a wonderfully intricate process of native alliances, wars with native princes, concessions, conquests, protectorates, and financial arrangements, whose complete history fills hundreds of volumes, and still has not been told in all its complex details."

(Note the slur about ousting the French and the suggestion of intrigue in English methods.)

"P. 207. Q. Did Germany's dye making affect other nations?

"A. The very first dye that was made by a German struck a sharp blow at England. In a way, it is correct to say that it was the invention of synthetic indigo that laid a foundation for the present war, in so far as the commercial feuds between England and Germany had something to do with the war. The production of synthetic indigo instantly struck and broke down one of England's sources of Indian wealth."

(This idea runs through a great many of the questions and answers, the idea that England's jealousy of Germany's economic prosperity caused the war.)

UTTERLY FALSE.

"P. 214. Q. Was there any similar division in other countries? (i. e., socialists and pan-Germanists in Germany.)

"A. Yes; speaking very broadly, by the beginning of 1918 there had come a pretty clear division in all countries, both allies and central powers, between a great body of public opinion that still felt that only by successful war could a just and lasting peace be won, and another smaller body of public opinion which took a position exactly the reverse—that the time had arrived when there was a strong possibility of approximating a just peace, and establishing certain international ideals, by negotiation rather than by military victory."

(This is an utterly false statement of the facts, as every well-informed man knows.)

"Q. How did Prussia become militaristic?

"A. As a result of being licked too often. * * * Whenever France wanted to fight Russia or Austria the road led through Wurtemberg, Bavaria, or Prussia. * * * At last the Prussians determined grimly to fight for themselves, and it was under the inspiration of a burning zeal and love for home and country that the seeds of militarism were sown."

(The very meaning of militarism is disguised in this passage, and one is led to sympathize with it rather than otherwise.)

HIGHEST ESTEEM.

"P. 215. Q. What is the German people's attitude toward the Kaiser?

"A. With the exception of the most radical Socialists, the German people hold their Kaiser in the highest esteem.

"Q. Has Germany a constitution?

"A. Yes; it has a written constitution, which is, on the whole, similar to the constitution of most large nations."

(Could anybody but a bigoted pro-German make such an answer?)

"P. 216. Q. Is the German Parliament at all like the United States Congress?

* * * * * * *

"A. In some ways it is like Congress. * * * The Bundesrath, or upper house, on the other hand, represents not the people of Germany, but the States specifically, as our Senate was supposed to do when United States Senators were selected by State legislatures instead of being elected by popular suffrage. In fact, our Senators still represent States rather than electors, in political principle, at least."

DAMNABLE DECEIT!

(Damnable deceit! Note the purposeful confusion of the principles and spirit of the two institutions. The German upper house is, of course, made up of members appointed by the sovereigns of the German States. Our Senate never was chosen by such autocratic method.)

"P. 216. Q. How do the upper houses compare?

"A. The 61 members of the Bundesrath are appointive, the governments of the various German States appointing the members for each session."

(Here again governments is confused with sovereigns.)

"Q. Can the King of England control the House of Lords?

"A. He can create a majority for himself in the House of Lords at any time by exercising his constitutional prerogative of creating new peers.

* * * * * * * *

"This power, like other powers latent under English political practice, had fallen into such oblivion that probably most Englishmen considered it practically dead; but it suddenly came to life when the House of Commons made its great fight in 1910–11 to wrest the power of veto from the House of Lords."

(This deceit is one of the most shameful of all, implying as it does that the King and not the prime minister really made the threat.)

MISLEADING.

"P. 217. Q. What is the German Reichstag representation?

"A. Each member represents about 130,000 inhabitants. This compares roughly with our Congress, each Congressman representing about 200,000 people now. The members of the British House of Commons represented counties and boroughs, many of widely differing areas and populations, until the passage of the new law above referred to; and there are also nine university members elected by the universities."

(Note that there is nothing about the failure to redistribute the representation since 1871, with the result that a workingman in Berlin has about one-tenth of the representation of a junker in East Prussia.)

"P. 218. Q. Do the other States like Prussia?

"A. Perhaps it is a good deal like the attitude of our smaller States toward the bigger ones."

(What a misleading answer!)

GERMAN EDUCATION.

"P. 220. Q. Does Germany lead in education?

"A. Before the war there was a general acceptance of the statement (made by nearly every writer and sociological student of the world) that Germany was eminent in advanced education.

"Q. How did German universities compare with the famous English ones?

"A. If universities, technical schools, production of books, and the like be taken as guides, Germany leads; Germany has 22 universities, with an enrollment of 53,000.

"Q. Does Germany publish more books than Great Britain?

"A. Roughly, in ordinary years there are some 12,000 works published in Great Britain. The annual German production is 35,000."

(The last three, by use of certain statistics, give an utterly false idea.)

OUT-AND-OUT LIE.

"P. 225. Q. Were German soldiers worse than others in the march on Pekin?

"A. According to revelations made by correspondents who managed to get through to Pekin, and by officers after the trouble was over, there seems to have been very little to choose between the conduct of the various troops. Of all, the Japanese emerged with the cleanest record and the Tonkinese troops of the French with the worst. The Kaiser's message to Count Waldersee, who commanded the expedition, has, however, been everywhere reproduced, and consequently it has been assumed that the atrocities attributed to the international troops were all committed by the Germans."

(This is the worst out-and-out lie in the book, but many half-truths do as much harm.)

PACIFIST MATERIAL.

"On page 244 there is fine material for the pacifist. The pages 6, 267, 268 would give an uninformed reader an idea very favorable to allowing the Germans to carry out the Berlin-Bagdad plan.

"All kinds of insinuating questions are asked in order to answer with something detrimental to the allies in the past. For examples, see page 157, about Gladstone and his 'Scrap of paper' speech; page 158, Destruction of Danish Navy by Nelson; page 267, Suez Canal Stocks; page 186, Japan.

"On page 295 there is a direct invitation to the public to disbelieve the current accusations about the German atrocious methods of carrying on war:

"Q. Has war ever produced so much hatred as this one?

"A. Always much the same kind of attacks as now on the Germans."

(Never in human history has a nation so aroused the moral indignation of the world as Germany has done.)

SUBTLY PERNICIOUS.

"If Mr. Creel indorses ideas like these, as it seems he must, since he heartily recommends this book in his introduction, is he a safe man to occupy the position he does, so potent for the good or ill of our cause?

"George H. Doran published an edition of this book at the request of the Review of Reviews without reading it and naturally supposing that, with George Creel's introduction, he had a kind of official guaranty. As soon as its disloyal and subtly pernicious character was pointed out to him, he immediately discontinued its sale and withdrew it from his catalogue. Some 1,100 copies had been sold."

[From the New York Times, Sept. 1, 1918.]

MANY BOOKS BARRED FROM ARMY READING—SECRETARY BAKER ORDERS DESTRUCTION OF LONG LIST OF TITLES IN ALL LIBRARIES—SOME BY FAMED WRITERS—PRO-GERMAN BOOKS KEPT IN PUBLIC LIBRARIES FOR STUDENTS, BUT NOT FOR CIRCULATION.

The removal or destruction of all copies of a long list of books, many of them by well-known authors, that may be found on the shelves of any of the camp libraries, has been ordered by Secretary of War Baker, according to information received yesterday at the New York headquarters of the library war service of the American Library Association.

The list includes works from the pens of John W. Burgess, formerly a professor in Columbia University; Frank Harris; the late Prof. Hugo Muensterberg, of Harvard University; Alexander Berkman, the anarchist, now in Atlanta, having been convicted of obstructing the draft; Scott Nearing, indicted for conspiring to obstruct the draft; Seumas MacManus; George Sylvester Viereck, former editor of the pro-German weekly Fatherland; Emily G. Balch, formerly of Wellesley and a well-known pacifist; Sven Hedin, the arctic explorer; Frederic C. Howe, commissioner of immigration at the port of New York; James K. McGuire, formerly mayor of Syracuse; Margaret Skinnider; and Count Ernst von Reventlow.

No explanation as to why the books were not regarded as desirable reading matter for soldiers was given in the order, but it was pointed out that in an order sent to all camp librarians on August 9, the director of library war service, Dr. Herbert Putnam, Librarian of Congress, said: "It has recently been brought to our attention that pamphlets of a pacifist character are being sent to camp libraries. Please watch for them and destroy them."

The information as to the latest order of the War Department came in the form of a circular letter sent out from the library war service headquarters in the Library of Congress to all camp librarians. The books listed in the order are the following:

Approaches to the Peace Settlement. E. G. Balch.
Prison Memoirs of an Anarchist, Alexander Berkman.
America's Relation to the Great War, John W. Burgess.
European War of 1914, John W. Burgess.
Witness Testifies, Capshaw Carson.
World in Perplexity, Arthur G. Daniells.
England's World Empire, A. H. Granger.
England or Germany, Frank Harris.
With the German Armies in the West, Sven Hedin.
Germany's Fighting Machine, E. F. Henderson.
Why War? Frederic C. Howe.
Germany Misjudged, Roland Higgins.
A More Excellent Way, Rufus M. Jones.
How to Protect Our Soldiers, W. S. Leake.
Revelations of an International Spy, I. T. T. Lincoln.
Germany in War Time, M. E. Macaulay.
What Could Germany do for Ireland? James K. McGuire.
Emden, H. Von Muecke.
The War in America, Hugo Muensterberg.
The Vampire of the Continent, Ernst von Reventlow.
"German-American Handbook," F. F. Schrader.
"Doing My Bit for Ireland," Margaret Skinnider.
"Conquest of War," M. M. Thomas and others.
"Songs of Armageddon," George Sylvester Viereck.
"World's Crisis in the Light of Prophecy," anonymous.

Earlier this month the War Department also placed its ban upon the following:

"Free Speech and a Free Press," anonymous.
"What Germany Wants," Edmund von Mach.
"Ireland's Case," Seumas MacManus.
"Open Letter to Profiteers," Scott Nearing.
"The Last Weapon," Theodora Wilson Wilson.

At the New York headquarters of the American Library Association, 124 East Twenty-eighth Street, it was said yesterday that no official reason was assigned for the War Department's order for the destruction of the books if found in camp libraries.

"The American Library Association is the sole organization for the distribution of books and magazines to the soldiers, sailors, and marines," said an official of the association. "But in addition to the books we buy for the use of our own camp libraries and those which we supply to the Y. M. C. A., the Knights of Columbus, and other relief organizations we collect and make available for soldiers' reading the books that are contributed by the general public.

"More than 3,000,000 books have been contributed thus far, and it is, of course, entirely possible that German propagandists have tried to slip their work across to the soldiers and sailors through this means. A very careful watch is kept, however, and the gift books are not placed in camp libraries without going through a process of examination and selection. So far we have no information that any of the books named in the War Department's order have actually reached the camp libraries, though there have been instances in which pamphlets of a seditious or pacifist nature have been surreptitiously placed on the open shelves of the libraries without the knowledge of the librarian.

"The working personnel of the Library War Service is composed of trained librarians of proved loyalty, and they are constantly on the alert against such insidious attempt to corrupt our fighting men."

Edwin H. Anderson, of the New York Public Library, who is a member of the war service committee of the American Library Association, when asked last night whether any of the books on the War Department's index were to be found in the New York public libraries, said he did not know. All sorts of books, he said, are found on the reference shelves for research students, the bad as well as the good. "If Satan wrote a pro-German book we should want it for our reference shelves," he said. "It might be of use to future historians. But in the circulating department we exclude all pro-German books, and have done so since the beginning of the war. We go over the books from time to time and take out those that are objectionable."

WAR BOOK 50–50, MR. CREEL SAYS—NEITHER REAL AMERICAN NOR PRO-GERMAN, HE DECLARES—REGRETS PUBLICITY.

George Creel, chairman of the Committee on Public Information, in a letter to the National Security League, made public last night, characterized as "dishonest and indecent" the publicity attending the suppression of the book, Two Thousand Questions and Answers About the War.

MADE PREVIOUS PROTEST.

Incorporated in the letter of protest from Mr. Creel to the league is also a letter the chairman of the Committee on Public Information wrote Dr. Albert Shaw, of the Review of Reviews, on June 26 of this year, in which attention of the editor of the magazine was called to shortcomings of the book, which was declared to be not out-and-out American. The book had its authorship with the Review of Reviews.

In his peroration, Mr. Creel declares that "he is led to believe that the sense of honor of Claude H. Van Tyne, of the department of history of the University of Michigan, now educational director of the league, who made the attack, is somewhat subordinate to his weakness for a little cheap notoriety."

HIS LETTER TO LEAGUE.

Mr. Creel's letter to the league follows:

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC INFORMATION,
Washington, September 12, 1918.

NATIONAL SECURITY LEAGUE,
31 Pine Street, New York, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: Certain New York papers, under date of September 12, carry articles to the effect that the National Security League has forced the suppression of a book entitled, "Two Thousand Question and Answers About the War," with a foreword by me, the plain inference being drawn that this "masterpiece of Hun propaganda," as your organization styles it, was being freely circulated without criticism of any kind until your own investigators took patriotic action.

I can not forego a public protest against the singular dishonesty and even indecency of this publicity. The book, instead of being without responsible authorship, bore the imprint of the Review of Reviews, and as far back as June 26 I wrote the following letter to Dr. Albert Shaw:

WRITES DR. ALBERT SHAW.

JUNE 26, 1918.

Dr. ALBERT SHAW,
Review of Reviews, New York City.

MY DEAR MR. SHAW: While it is true that I glanced through the proofs of "Two Thousand Questions and Answers About the War" before I wrote my foreword, it is equally true that I relied less upon my hasty reading than upon my absolute faith in you.

The last week or so I have made a more careful study of the book, and I must confess to a very definite disturbance of mind. The whole tone of the book strikes me as being fifty-fifty, for nowhere in it can I find the fundamental truth that Germany was entirely responsible for this war and that it is a war of self-defense upon the part of the liberal nations of the world. In connection with atrocities, deportations, hostages, use of gas, I am also unable to find anything that is in the nature of a straight-out condemnation of the Germans.

I feel sure that you yourself could not have had much to do with the book, or else the articles would have had a more intense Americanism and less of the evasive, straddling note. If there is a second edition, I do wish that you would take the whole matter up with me, so that this very valuable contribution to war can be given greater effectiveness.

Sincerely,

GEORGE CREEL, Chairman.

MAKES SPECIFIC OBJECTIONS.

This letter was followed at once by seven single-spaced typewritten pages, pointing out specific objections. Dr. Shaw replied at once, promising instant correction and fullest revision. He also stated that the book was based upon the accumulation of material secured in advance sheets from the well-known British journalist, the son of the late William T. Stead, and because of its source the editors had not given it the necessary searching scrutiny.

I then took up the matter with Mr. George H. Doran, the publisher, who, with his usual eager patriotism, agreed that the sale of the book should be stopped until its contents were satisfactory to me. Because there was not the slightest evidence of any premeditated pro-Germanism in the matter, because the good faith and true Americanism of all the parties in the controversy were so obvious, and because the book itself had been stopped and a new edition under way, I avoided all publicity in the matter out of my desire to work no injustice to anyone.

All these facts were laid before Prof. Van Tyne, of your organization. By this careful suppression of them in the story that he gave to the press I am led to believe that his sense of honor is somewhat subordinated to his weakness for a little cheap notoriety.

Very truly,

GEORGE CREEL, Chairman.

[From the Washington Post, Sept. 17, 1918.]

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY'S PEACE PROPOSAL IS REJECTED BY THE UNITED STATES IN 68 WORDS HALF AN HOUR AFTER ITS DELIVERY.

Within half an hour after the peace proposal of the Austro-Hungarian Government was received from the Swedish Minister, Secretary of State Lansing last evening issued the following statement:

"I am authorized by the President to state that the following will be the reply of this Government to the Austro-Hungarian note proposing an official conference of belligerents:

"'The Government of the United States feels that there is only one reply which it can make to the suggestion of the Imperial Austro-Hungarian Government. It has repeatedly and with entire candor stated the terms upon which the United States would consider peace and can and will entertain no proposal for a conference upon a matter concerning which it has made its position and purpose so plain.'"

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, with regard to the subject matter of the admirable discourse of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] I am sure I voice the sentiment of this side of the Chamber in saying that there can be no difference of opinion regarding the purpose of America in entering this war, the cause of the war, and the common determination of American sentiment everywhere to carry the war on for those principles and to that end. Propaganda designed in any way to weaken the morale of the people or cast a doubt upon our purpose should be rigidly suppressed. We can not, however much we may try, entirely suppress it; but we can reduce it to the minimum, and whenever it appears public attention should be directed to it, either in the Senate or the House or wherever it can receive the greatest publicity, to the end that it may be effectually terminated.

The President of the United States has voiced the sentiment of America in the briefest official announcement ever delivered upon any important subject. It speaks for the Nation, for Democrats and for Republicans, for Americans everywhere. All honor to him for his courage, his determination, and his leadership.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I notice there is no unfinished business upon the calendar. I wish to give notice that at the close of the morning hour I shall submit some remarks in answer to the peace proposal of the Kaiser, as made September 12 at the Krupp munition works.

DISPOSITION OF OIL LANDS.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, on January 8 last the Senate passed Senate bill 2812; the House passed it in the month of May, and on the 27th day of May last the Senate conferees were appointed, the bill having been amended in the House. On the 28th day of May the House appointed its conferees. It is accordingly, Mr. President, eight months since that bill passed the Senate and more than five months since the conferees of both Houses were appointed to consider the differences which exist with reference to it. The bill provides for the appropriation and disposition of the public lands containing nonmetallic minerals, including oil.

A report came to the Senate a few days ago exhibiting the fact that there will be a deficit of a million barrels of oil during the current year. So far as anybody knows the only source of supply there is outside of the fields already developed is on the public domain. These fields have been locked up for years, and it was the purpose of this bill to free them for development and exploitation. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the chairman of the conference committee, what prospect there is of a speedy report from the conference committee on that bill?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I realize that the length of time that the conferees on the bill have taken might indicate that there has been some neglect on their part. In the first place, I wish to assure the Senator from Montana and the Senate that every member of the committee has been making most sincere efforts to reach an agreement. We have had a number of meetings, but at several of those meetings it appeared that no agreement could possibly be reached, and that we would be compelled to report a disagreement. Realizing, however, the importance of this measure, particularly at this time, the conferees have manifested the utmost patience.

I say, Mr. President, there is not a western member of the conference committee who is in touch with the situation who does not fully understand the danger of delay. We must immediately pass the leasing bill in some form or the Government will take over and develop and operate all the oil fields and wells of the country.

I am aware that there are those high in authority who believe that it would be to the best interest of this country if the Government did take over all of the coal fields and the oil fields, and possibly the gold and the silver and the copper and the lead mines of this country, and operate them in behalf of the people. Their opinions are entitled to weight and will have weight with the people of the country, but I do not agree with that policy, and I do not believe that there is a western representative on the committee who agrees with such precipitate and revolutionary action. I know that there are those high in authority to-day who are attempting to establish a new policy. They hold that every exhaustible resource of the country must be taken over and held by the Government and by the Government be developed and utilized.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if that opinion is voiced from or represented upon the committee of conference?

Mr. PITTMAN. It is not represented upon that committee, to my knowledge, by anyone, but is possibly sustained by one member of the conference committee, who is not a Member of this body.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Is it not a fact that, generally speaking, the Congress is losing faith in the leasing system as a whole, and that there is not the enthusiasm for the leasing proposition that there was a year ago?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I do not know whether or not I can answer that question with any force and effect. I know that the leasing system in Alaska has probably proven a failure, but I am not so sure as to whether it is a failure of the system or a failure of the operation of the system; and that brings about the very disagreement between the Senate bill and the House bill. The House bill attempts to grant absolute discretion to a department. The Senate bill attempts to limit that discretion and define it as practically as the occasion will permit. Now, that is the distinction.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield again.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me the difficulty, both with reference to the measure about which the Senator is speaking, and also the water-power bill and all other leasing measures which are now in process of completion, is that we are not willing to give enough power or enough latitude to private parties to induce them to go in and develop; and, on the other hand, we have not got quite the courage to say that we are in favor of public ownership and development. These leasing systems are all circumscribed and limited in a way which discourages private investment, and at the same time we apparently are not prepared to go to the other proposition and develop it ourselves. My opinion is that before we get through we will abandon the leasing system on both propositions.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, there is no question that if we do not pass in the near future a bill which will provide for the development of the 6,000,000 acres of oil lands that are withdrawn and the 44,000,000 acres of coal lands that are withdrawn, the necessity of the case will force the President of the United States, under the power now vested in him, to take possession of, develop, and operate the mines in those lands.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. Just a second, if the Senator will pardon me; I am not through with the subject. I am, however, one of those who believe that it would be disastrous, not only locally to the country where those great enterprises exist, but to the initiative and to those characteristics of the American people that have made them the most forceful people in the world. I believe that you would have a development of the minerals now in sight, and you would never find any more minerals that are lying hidden under the ground. I think you would drive away from the West the prospector, a peculiar individual that circumstances have developed in that country, and without whom no mines would have been found. You will drive him to South America, you will drive him to Siberia, to China, to Africa, to everywhere else on earth where there is a reward for individual suffering and initiative. Not only that, but you would drive out of the West the capital that is willing to take chances on finding something hidden in the ground, the capital that has always been a gambling capital; a man who will risk all he has upon the theory that thousands of feet under the ground he will get something of value. These men and their engineers and their associates, deprived of every opportunity for investment and speculation, will go.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. May I inquire of the Senator whether there is any immediate prospect of an agreement of the conference committee? My reason for asking the question is that I have prepared an amendment, and expect to offer it to what is known as the power bill, Senate bill 1419, the amendment consisting of the bill which was passed by the Senate last winter and which the Senator is now discussing. I intended to send it to the desk, and will do so when we reach that order of business.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I desire to say to the Senator from Colorado that my understanding about the matter is that that is the bill which has come to us from the House with the enacting clause stricken out and the so-called House bill substituted for it.

Mr. THOMAS. I understand that; but it still bears the number and the title, as I understand.

Mr. WALSH. But it would not be subject to amendment in this body.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, that is a question. I think it will be, and I propose to insist upon the amendment; and if it is not permissible under the rules, then that bill should go to a committee, and it ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands anyhow, because it covers a subject which was not involved in the original Shields bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment, the trouble about the matter is that that bill is not before us.

Mr. THOMAS. The bill has been sent here, and this bill is reported.

Mr. WALSH. It is a Senate bill that went to the House.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. That ends the matter, so far as the legislative consideration of it is concerned.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, does it? The mere fact that the House substitutes a bill for the Senate bill certainly can not deprive this body of the right of amendment. If it can, then the sooner we amend our own rules the better.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order and ask what the business before the Senate is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The discussion as to when a report is going to be made is not in order if there is objection.

Mr. PITTMAN. I trust the Senator will not object.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have no objection, except that I wanted to suggest that there is a Senator here who has to leave on a train in a short time, and who desires to present a matter after the morning business is concluded.

Mr. PITTMAN. I could have presented this matter in a very few minutes, of course, except for the natural argument that arises; and I should like now to finish it, so that I will never have to answer the inquiry again, if the Senator does not object.

The Senator from Colorado has asked what progress is being made toward an agreement, and I have simply stated that, in my opinion, unless we pass something immediately we will go to Government ownership, which every western man deplores for many reasons, principally because there will never be any more hidden minerals discovered. The Government now has full control over prices, over transportation, and the use of such products; therefore it has every control that is necessary in getting the product for the people as cheaply as possible. It is only a question of production. It is only a question of providing a means by which mining men may operate these fields.

The Senate is wedded to certain principles in the Senate bill, and it is the duty of the Senate conferees to attempt to sustain those principles. I want to say now that when the letters are read which I am about to send to the desk you will see the position of the conference committee, and you will not have to ask me about it. The only difference between the two bills is that the Senate bill limits the discretion of the Department of the Interior wherever it can actually define rules and regulations for operation. The House bill, as I understand, simply turns over the public lands to the Secretary of the Interior and says: "Lease them on such conditions as you want to, in such quantities as you want to, when you want to, and refuse a lease to anybody that you do not desire to lease them to."

Mr. SMOOT. "And value them at anything you want to."

Mr. PITTMAN. That is the situation.

Mr. BORAH. As a practical fact and as a working proposition, both bills will result in the same thing.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not think that is true with regard to the Senate bill, but I want to state very frankly to the Senator from Idaho that I have not very much hope that Congress will ever pass a practical leasing bill. This body could pass a practical leasing bill because it is composed of a smaller number of men, it is composed of a greater number of business men, and it would pass a bill that would be operative. The bill that Congress as a united body will pass will be a magnificent piece of idealism that will become forever inoperative, because no man will risk a dollar under it. That has proven true in Alaska. The situation is here, however, and I ask the Senator from Idaho now if he would like to-day to see the oil fields and the coal fields of the West taken over, developed, and operated under the power now vested in the President of the United States?

Mr. BORAH. I do not think the President has the power to do it now.

Mr. PITTMAN. Well, if he has the power?

Mr. BORAH. But, as the Senator knows, I have always been opposed to the leasing system, and I still am.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator has not answered my question on the matter. I will not press it, however, because it is not really material.

Mr. BORAH. I am waiting for an opportunity to discuss that question with reference to the water-power proposition, when I shall undertake to define my position fully.

Mr. PITTMAN. I believe that the President has the power. I believe that those who legally advise with the President have advised him that he has the power, and I believe that if we do not pass this bill he will take over those fields. I believe that the policy will not only extend to the oil fields of the country but to the coal fields of the country, and possibly to the copper, lead, silver, and gold mines; it will be so extended under the policy now attempted to be established to every exhaustible resource. That is the theory of it, and I say that it is deplorable.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. KIRBY. Why would it not be better for the Government to operate its oil fields and its coal fields that are now on the public lands than to allow them to be opened to exploitation by private interests, and then have the Government exploited by private interests for their operation? Did we not pass a bill here the other day authorizing the Government to assist the private mining interests throughout this country because it was not able to take care of them in the field of developing metals?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, for nine years the Government has had 6,000,000 acres of geologically described oil lands, and when we have asked the Government to go in and develop any portion of that 6,000,000 acres the governmental authorities have said they did not know where to go except where the prospector had already found oil. It is a fact—and I say this to the Senator because he is not from the mining country—that neither a geologist nor any engineer ever found a mine. They do not find them. I want to say to the Senator that the Government of the United States has not even found water on the arid lands of the West, and yet every year we have appropriated some money for such purpose. Why do they not do it? Because there is only one mine out of a thousand that is found and somebody has to lose 999 mines in order to find that one. Again, it requires a peculiar character of man to find it. You will exhaust the stuff that somebody else has already found for the Government. The Government did not find the oil that is now bubbling out of the ground throughout the West. The Government did not find the coal out there. Somebody had found it with labor, with an expenditure of their lives, with money. Now that it is found, there are people coming from other sections of the country and saying, "This does not belong to you people that have found it, although you found it under the invitation of the Government; it belongs to all of the people of this country." It does belong to all of the people of this country, but the people of this country are not so selfish or narrow-minded as not to want to compensate those people in some way, to some extent, for the great discoveries they have made.

Mr. KIRBY. Did not the mining industry ask for a bill here the other day for the Government to take charge of and develop these different propositions that have been discovered out in the West, saying that they were not able to do it and that the Government needed the product?

Mr. PITTMAN. Oh, no, no. I understand that the Senator, coming from a logging country or a farming country or something like that, does not know anything about mines. That bill did not deal with the commonly known metals of this country. It dealt with rare metals, those of which we have only small quantities here. It was an attempt to foster in this country, by reason of war conditions, an industry that does not exist in this country but has existed in other countries. It was an attempt to induce persons to develop manganese because we must have it and because it can only pay by the giving of a bonus, or something of that kind. It does not apply to oil or coal or gold or silver or lead or copper or zinc or any of the well-known metals that the miner has discovered and that have made this the greatest mineral country in the world.

I ask that the letters that I send to the desk may be read, and then I shall be through.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEPTEMBER 0, 1918.

The honorable SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR, City.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The conference committee on the oil-lands leasing bill have had several meetings, yet have not made any substantial progress toward an agreement. The chief difficulty seems to be a difference of opinion among various conferees as to the attitude of the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Attorney General with regard to certain provisions of the Senate bill.

The members of the conference on behalf of the House indicate that they believe that no report would be approved by the House if it met the opposition of any one of the departments referred to. The members of the conference on the part of the Senate have no doubt that unless some of the provisions of the House bill are either eliminated or materially modified a report including such provisions would not be approved by the Senate. In other words, if the managers upon the part of the House and the Senate are not at liberty to compromise the differences between the two bills, the conferees cease to possess the functions of a conference committee and should so report to their respective bodies.

Every member of the conference is fully conscious of the necessity for the legislation, and is desirous of arriving at an agreement with regard to a bill that may become a law. The departments above named have on several occasions had representatives before the Public Lands Committee of the Senate and the Public Lands Committee of the House and before other committees having such legislation under consideration. In some matters it is now contended by members of the conference that the position taken by some of these representatives has been repudiated by their chiefs. In the opinion of the conference committee these disputed facts can only satisfactorily be settled by the chiefs themselves.

For the foregoing reasons I am directed by the committee to urge you to confer with the heads of the other departments so as to fix a convenient date upon which you may jointly confer with the committee. I am authorized to suggest that, if it suits your convenience, the committee would be pleased to hold a session during any evening. The committee will hold no further meetings until something definite is done in this matter.

Very respectfully, yours,

KEY PITTMAN,
Chairman of the Conference Committee on Senate Bill S. 2812.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, September 16, 1918.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am sending you a copy of a letter which upon receipt of your letter I sent to the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Navy, together with copies of their replies. I shall see Attorney General Gregory and Secretary Daniels on Tuesday and see if they are willing to participate in such a conference. Of course, I am ready to do so at any time.

Cordially, yours, FRANKLIN K. LANE.

Hon. KEY PITTMAN,
United States Senate.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, September 12, 1918.

DEAR MR. ATTORNEY GENERAL: Here is a copy of a letter that I have received from Senator PITTMAN. Will it be agreeable to you if we meet with the committee on Monday evening next? I fix that evening only to have a day certain. Any other evening will be acceptable to me. I think we ought to let the committee know as soon as possible what date we have agreed upon.

Cordially, yours, FRANKLIN K. LANE.

Hon. T. W. GREGORY,
The Attorney General.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., September 14, 1918.

Hon. FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I acknowledge receipt of yours of the 12th suggesting that you, the Secretary of the Navy, and I meet with the conference committee on the oil lands leasing bill on Monday afternoon of next week.

As far as I am concerned this will not be practicable and I am also told that the Secretary of the Navy has indicated to you that he could not make such an engagement for Monday afternoon. I may be in position to talk the matter over with you after Cabinet meeting on next Tuesday. I have not finally made up my mind as to whether or not I should attend such a conference.

Cordially, yours,

T. W. GREGORY,
Attorney General.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not that mean that these heads of departments are to meet and confer for the purpose of determining what sort of a bill they will allow the Congress of the United States to enact?

Mr. PITTMAN. That is exactly the position.

Mr. THOMAS. I wanted to know.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator is absolutely right. It means that the conferees on the part of the House indicate to us that no other kind of a bill can pass, and therefore they have been invited to advise us. I ask that the letter of the Secretary of the Navy be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, September 12, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have your letter inclosing one from Senator PITTMAN. My engagements are such that it will be impossible for me to be at the meeting on Monday afternoon. I will see you at the Cabinet Tuesday about the matter. I do not see that I could agree going any further than we have gone in the House bill, but I will, however, talk with you about it on Tuesday.

Cordially, yours, JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

Hon. FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D. C.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I think that shows very plainly the condition the committee is in. It is apparent to me that we will either adopt whatever policy they will let us adopt or you will have Government ownership all over the West in the oil and coal lands, the phosphate lands, and, under the same theory, the copper, the iron, the zinc, the lead, and other metals. I for one would deplore that result.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I want to make further answer to the question propounded by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]. As the Senator from Montana knows, there has been a bill in this body for some time called the Walsh bill, providing for the leasing of coal, oil, phosphate, sodium, and other mineral lands upon the public domain. There have been also bills introduced by me as to those lands which provide for the entry system, a system under which the Government of the United States developed its resources with marvelous results until about 15 years ago, when such lands were withdrawn from entry.

Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] was formerly the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, and when he came to this body he stated to Senator WALSH and me that he felt confident that if we would compromise our differences by giving to the locator the right to buy at public auction, as provided in my bill, or to lease at public auction, as provided in Senator WALSH's bill, it would meet the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. Senator WALSH having contended that no one would buy who could lease, and I having contended that no one would lease who could buy, a compromise bill was effected embodying those and some other principles which we expected would go through, it having, as I understood, the approval of the Interior Department. That was the bill which was presented to and was passed by the Senate. Certain concessions were made upon both sides. The principle applied to the oil lands was a leasing system upon three-fourths of the land located and a patent to one-fourth thereof as a reward to the prospector for his discovery. When we met the conferees of the House, we found that the House had passed a straight leasing bill; that there was nothing therein in the way of a concession of any kind to that which we think is absolutely necessary to the development of our natural resources.

When people undertake to float a coal-mining enterprise, with the necessity of buying a million dollars' worth of machinery and building a railroad that will cost a million or two million dollars, it is folly to think there can be any development unless you present a title that the money lender will lend money upon. He will not lend money upon a leasehold estate that may be forfeited.

That is the situation in the conference and those are the main differences between the House and the Senate. We are simply standing by the Senate bill, and the people who believe in the entry system in the compromise bill had conceded to a large extent the contention of the advocates of the leasing system. It seems to me when the House attempted to make this purely a leasing bill without any alternative it provided that kind of a title upon which you can not borrow money for the development of these resources; it is practically a measure that means no development whatever. That is the condition we are trying to meet in the committee. We are trying to insist that the compromise which the Senator from Montana and the Senator from New Mexico and myself agreed upon shall be carried out. It was carried out substantially in the Senate. It has been totally ignored in the House.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield.

Mr. KING. I was going to invite the attention of the Senator to the fact that when the bill came before the Senate he, as well as others, gave assurances that the executive department of the Government had agreed to the provisions of the bill. What I want to ask the Senator now is whether those same executive heads have receded from the agreement which they made and the assurance which they gave, and whether they are standing in the way of the Senate bill, whether they are guilty of punic faith, or whether it is some other agency?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I must say that the understanding we had related only to the Secretary of the Interior. I have been to see the Secretary of the Interior with relation to this matter, and, with very slight modifications, he is willing to take the Senate bill. He has assured me that he has not any objection to the alternative proposition that is presented as to coal lands and also as to some of the other matters that are contained in the bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think the statement of the Senator from Colorado might give a mistaken impression with regard to the House bill when he says it is a purely straight leasing bill with regard to coal. The House bill reaffirms the present selling clause in the existing law with regard to coal. The only distinction between them is that the House, by reaffirming existing law, provides that an agent of the Government shall appraise the land, and no matter how erroneous he may appraise it, or how high, it can not be sold for less. Under the Senate bill there is a minimum price fixed. There is competitive bidding so as to ascertain the value, and then there is still reserved in the Secretary of the Interior the right to refuse all bids that he considers unfair. So both bills provide for the same thing; but the House provision, as found in the existing law, has proven wholly impracticable.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The difficulty with the situation as to the present law is simply this: In the first place, you can not compete with the large coal-mining companies in the country unless you can acquire more coal land than 160 or 320 acres now authorized. Consequently people will not take up only that quantity of land for the purpose of opening a coal mine.

Another thing, about 12 or 15 years ago there was placed such an enormous price upon the coal land under the present system that no one would enter the same. Land that ordinarily was worth $25 or $50 an acre was placed at $500 or $400 an acre and that was prohibitive. Consequently under the law as it exists at the present time we do not get any development. I do not believe there have been a thousand acres of public coal land sold a year in the United States in the last three or four years. It is due to the fact that there have been these exorbitant prices placed on it. In the meantime the coal companies that own large acreage have the monopoly of production and exact exhorbitant prices for coal. According to a report of the Geological Survey there are 371,000,000,000 tons of coal in Colorado, enough to supply the world at the present rate of consumption for 200 years, and in Wyoming enough to supply the world for 300 years.

Mr. President, it does seem to me that we ought to give a satisfactory answer to the question by saying that we are standing by the Senate bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I regret that this debate has been so prolonged, but I trust the Senate will permit me to make another suggestion in respect to the bill. There are certain features of the bill referred to as relief provisions intended for the relief of certain claims in the States of California and Wyoming in controversy with the Government concerning the title. My State is not interested in those provisions nor am I advised that any other States than these two are interested. These provisions cover only a very small portion of the oil lands in those States. All the rest of the oil lands and the great phosphate deposits of my State and Wyoming and Utah are tied up. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Nevada——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I will yield in just a minute. I inquire of the Senator from Nevada if those provisions were eliminated from the bill whether there would be any prospect of an agreement that would permit the disposition of all other lands that are not in dispute.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, if they were eliminated from the bill there would, of course, still be the disagreement with regard to the limited discretion in the Department of the Interior, but it would not be so serious a contest, because it would deal more with something we expect to have than that which we have. On the other hand, I think the Senator from Montana is mistaken in one thing. He says that the area that would be affected by the elimination would be small in comparison to the land that would then be affected by the bill. I do not think that is true. I believe that practically every known oil field in the United States to-day is in litigation or under protest by the Department of Justice.

The main object of this bill is to increase the production of oil, and unless we deal with lands that are in contest, lands the title to which is disputed by the Government, we will not have available sufficient oil lands to increase the production which this country requires.

It is for that reason and that reason only that we can not eliminate such lands from this bill.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit me, I think there is another reason. It is true that as the situation now stands, this bill affects a comparatively small acreage, but the difficulty is that with every extension of oil discoveries there is an extension of interference by the Government, and as fast as the prospector finds oil just so fast the Government steps in and takes it away from him. These reservations and the operation of this leasing bill are commensurate only with the extent of possible oil resources on the public domain.

Mr. WALSH. I understand that there is a provision in both bills to the effect that no further reservation shall be made.

Mr. THOMAS. I am aware of that provision. I am aware also of the fact, and I do not think it is exaggerated, that as you go out to prospect Government agents go along for the purpose of ascertaining what the developments are, and if they are favorable a report is made and, as a consequence, there is immediate action upon the part of the Government.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me, I was merely inquiring whether we could not pass a law that could be made applicable to all present undisputed areas. For instance, there is no controversy about phosphates anywhere. Why can we not have a law that will permit an appropriation of phosphate lands? Why must a law providing for the disposition of phosphate lands await the determination of a controversy concerning certain oil lands in the State of California and the State of Wyoming?

Mr. THOMAS. The reason would seem to be administrative interference.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think the Senator from Montana should introduce a separate bill for phosphates, just as the Senator from Nevada introduced a separate bill for potash. The potash bill became a law. It is unfortunate that phosphates have been put with oil, but the question that I was asking is whether it is practicable to eliminate from consideration in this bill the so-called relief provisions. I say it is not practicable, because the so-called relief measures takes in practically all the great known oil fields, and the real object of this bill is to provide a machinery for the development of those known oil fields, and we have either got to provide machinery for the development and operation of such oil fields immediately, or the Government will take them under the power heretofore granted.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? Is it expected to settle this mineral-land question during the morning hour?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; but I will state very frankly to the Senator that this is the first opportunity which has arisen wherein I could explain the situation. I consider that the conference is in a very serious situation, and I consider the effect of a disagreement of the conferees not only disastrous, as I said before, to the great industries of the West but disastrous to the development of minerals in this country in the future. I think it will mean that the discovery of minerals of this country will practically cease. I do not think it will cheapen such products, because the Government to-day has complete control over the price. I think it would be a catastrophe, and I want to warn the Senate of the situation and prepare the people of the country for the shock.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, some of us seem to be laboring under a misunderstanding as to the situation. There is a law now for the operation of phosphate lands, coal lands, oil lands, and all other mineral lands in the United States. The trouble is that the Department of the Interior has withdrawn the lands from the operation of the law—the statute upon the books under which all these deposits can be acquired and can be worked for war necessities or peace requirements. The Department of the Interior under its theory has withdrawn to a great extent the phosphate lands, the coal lands, and the oil lands from development, and no individual can acquire these under the law which the Congress of the United States enacted. The Department of the Interior has a theory that it must change the law under which those deposits have been operated, and which still stands as the law unrepealed by Congress. The theory of the department was that the development should be by lease. The theory of the Senate was that the individual acquiring the lands might be allowed to acquire them by either lease or outright purchase.

The committee of conference is in a deadlock over those two propositions, the members of the committee on the part of the Senate insisting upon the alternative proposition of handling these deposits and the members of the committee on the part of the other House insisting upon its bill, which contains only the lease provisions, and those worked out in such a way that to those of us who are practical mining men it seems it would be idle to enact the proposed legislation at all.

I am frank to say, sir, that, in my judgment, if the House bill were adopted, it would not be operative, and that the next step in Government ownership would be an application to the Congress of the United States for an enormous appropriation through which the Bureau of Mines or some other bureau or department of the Government might proceed to operate the oil lands and the other mineral lands of the United States. That, however, is merely my judgment.

I may say, further, frankly, that at the last meeting of the committee which I attended we were informed—at least, I understood that was the information intended to be given and which, according to my understanding, was imparted to us—that the House bill had received the approval of the Department of the Interior; that the Senate bill had not; and that unless the House bill was adopted by both bodies nothing would be the result; in other words, that the Senate bill would not be signed even if it were passed by Congress. That is the situation.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask what is the order of business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The order of business is reports of committees. If there be none, the introduction of bills and joint resolutions is in order. Concurrent and other resolutions are now in order.

Mr. POMERENE. I send to the desk a resolution and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 306), as follows:

Whereas a political committee in the State of Michigan has reported that it received $178,856 and expended $176,568.08 in conducting the campaign for the nomination of a candidate for United States Senator in Michigan; and

Whereas reports are current in the public prints and elsewhere to the effect that extravagantly large sums have been expended in campaigns for the nomination of candidates for Senator in other States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or a subcommittee thereof, be authorized and directed to investigate the subject of said receipts and expenditures, with a view to ascertaining whether or not, and to what extent, moneys have been collected and disbursed in violation of law, either State or National; to make report thereof to the Senate; and also to report what, if any, additional legislation may be necessary in order to further limit the excessive use of money in either primary or general elections; and be it further

Resolved, That the said committee, or subcommittee thereof, is hereby given power and authorized, during the sessions of the Senate or during recess, to summon witnesses, administer oaths, and take testimony under oath as to all matters and things covered by this resolution, and to employ such clerical and stenographic assistance as may be necessary under the circumstances, the expenses of the committee, or subcommittee thereof, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, a good deal of information has come to me bearing upon the subject covered by the resolution and upon the question as it relates to several other States. It was not, however, until I had been furnished with a copy of the account which had been filed by this committee that I felt constrained to present this resolution. I have before me a copy of that account, which shows the receipts and disbursements. The receipts amounted to $178,856 and the expenditures to $176,568.08. It shows advertising in 650 newspapers; it shows 285 newspaper subscriptions; it shows personal contributions from 69 sources, ranging from $1 to something like $99,000.

I do not care to discuss the question of the excessive expenditure of money in campaigns nor the effect of it; that question has been fully discussed in the Senate. However, this comes at a time when, if I understand the public viewpoint, the people are more than interested to know whether any of these expenditures have been in violation of any statute, State or National. At the same time it is only just that the position of the candidate in whose behalf these collections were made and moneys disbursed should have his side of the case presented. He filed, under the corrupt-practices act of the United States, an affidavit, in which this language appears under the subject of "Contributions":

None with my knowledge and consent.

Under the column designated as "Disbursements—What given, contributed, expended, used or promised, and to whom," follows this language:

None with my knowledge and consent. I have read a general public statement of Paul H. King concerning expenditures made by a volunteer committee of my friends, but these were made without my knowledge or consent.

Mr. President, I also have before me a copy of the Detroit News of the date of Thursday, August 22, 1918, which contains a letter addressed by Lieut. Gov. Loren D. Dickinson to Hon. Truman H. Newberry, Brooklyn Navy Yard, N. Y. I ask that it may be read into the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Hon. TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY,
Brooklyn Navy Yard, New York.

DEAR SIR: Men of all walks of life who have the best interests of our State at heart believe the men who are conducting your campaign for United States Senator are conducting one that will bring one of the greatest scandals on our State that Michigan politics ever saw, and have asked me to take the lead in attempting to rid our State of this blight.

CAMPAIGN CALLED "ROTTEN."

I note by your statement that you say you do not know of these things.

In giving you the information I will give you the terms that I hear everywhere in the 62 counties in which I have been recently. I have always had the highest regard for you and must believe you will relieve the Republican Party and the State of a campaign that is now being likened to the notorious Lorimer campaign of Illinois a few years ago. The terms "boodle" and "rotten" seem to be general terms that I hear.

Every section of the State shows evidence of an expensive newspaper campaign, costing thousands and thousands of dollars. Thousands of men are liberally paid for work at many more thousands of dollars, an expensive suite of offices with a large force sending out hundreds of thousands of letters to influential voters at more thousands of dollars, thousands of autos already engaged for use on primary day at many more thousands, that practically every opponent of the primary system is backing your campaign and that hundreds of the experts who have figured in or conducted for money the wet campaigns of the past are among the most active of your supporters.

CLAIMS $500,000 FUND.

Conservative estimates say everywhere from $250,000 to $500,000 is being used. The good people of the State are apparently powerless to give the voters these matters on short notice. In case you get the most votes you must expect to have the placing of your name on the election ballot contested. If by technical reasons you succeed then you must expect every church and moral organization to work until election night to keep our fair State from the baneful influence that success following such methods would leave for years to come.

Should you be successful at the polls, you must expect a legislative investigation that would be demanded by an indignant populace. And if by technicalities you could overcome this you will probably have to face a Democratic Senate, which will unseat you, as it justly unseated William Lorimer, jr., because of flagrant disregard in your behalf of Michigan's primary laws. The effect on the Republican Party with the people demanding cleaner things can not be estimated. Already we hear the Democrats will make the corrupting use of money in your campaign one of their great campaign arguments.

ASKS WITHDRAWAL.

I can not believe you understand the situation, and if you did you would come to the rescue. I am, therefore, asking you in behalf of the old Republican Party, clean politics, preservation of the primaries, social and business interests, to withdraw from this campaign and save the everlasting disgrace to the party and the State from a pollution that would stay for years. Hoping you may act favorably and retain the high esteem in which you have been held in the State, I am,

Sincerely, yours,

L. D. DICKINSON,
Lieutenant Governor of Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio permit me to ask the date of that letter to the candidate?

Mr. POMERENE. It was printed, I may say to the Senator, in the Detroit News of August 22, and, of course, was written on or before that date and before the primary election.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. When was the report of receipts and expenditures filed with the Secretary of the Senate?

Mr. POMERENE. I am informed that the certificate of expenditures was sworn to on August 29 and filed in the Secretary's office on September 5.

Mr. President, I have here what purports to be an accurate copy of the receipts and expenditures as filed under the Michigan State law, and, for the information of Senators, I ask that it be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

In accordance with act 109, public acts of 1913, I, Frank W. Blair, treasurer of the Truman H. Newberry Senatorial Committee, which committee was organized to promote the candidacy of Truman H. Newberry for nomination to the office of United States Senator at the primary election held on the 27th day of August, 1918, in the State of Michigan, hereby submit the following detailed statement of disbursements, receipts, and unpaid debts or obligations:

Disbursements as per accompanying statement.

Unpaid debts or obligations: None, to the best of my knowledge, information, and belief.

STATE OF MICHIGAN,
County of Wayne:

Frank W. Blair, being duly sworn, deposes and says that the foregoing is a full, true, and detailed account and statement of his disbursements, receipts, and unpaid debts or obligations, made, received, and incurred as treasurer of the Truman H. Newberry senatorial committee in connection with said campaign for the nomination aforesaid.

FRANK W. BLAIR.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 6th day of September, 1918.

PAUL R. DAILEY,
Notary Public, Wayne County, Mich.

My commission expires August 16, 1921.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, in presenting this matter I want it distinctly understood that I am not attempting in any wise to prejudge this case. I express no opinion as to whether or not these moneys were legally or illegally contributed, or legally or illegally distributed. That is a matter for the committee first to determine and later for the Senate to pass judgment upon. I express no opinion as to the legal effect of these expenditures. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest that the resolution should go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. It would eventually have to go to that committee before it is acted upon by the Senate, but I should like to have it first referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Very well; the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I am surprised at the action of the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections in presenting this resolution to the Senate at this time. While I have the utmost respect for the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], as he well understands and has known ever since we entered the Senate together, yet I am forced to believe that politics inspires this proceeding. It must not be forgotten that the President assumed to select a candidate for United States Senator from Michigan. A man was chosen by him evidently with the idea that he would run on both tickets, and the program was carried out in this regard.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the Senator will allow me to finish my statement then I will yield. This candidate did run on both tickets in the primaries. It was charged at that time, proven, and admitted that he had contracts with the Government the profits of which would amount to millions of dollars—$30,000,000, I believe. It was a cost-plus contract, where there was no possible chance for the contractor to lose. It was urged in the primary campaign, which was a very warm one, that Mr. Ford, the candidate on both tickets, the President's candidate, was making this sum of money, or stood to make it; and, therefore, he came out in a statement saying that his share of the profits from the contract would be turned over to the Government. This statement was made in the midst of the campaign, when it might be beneficial in influencing the votes at the primary. Possibly the committee will investigate that fact. That it might have influenced votes for Mr. Ford no one can deny. The major part of $30,000,000 is greater than $176,000.

The letter which has been read into the RECORD, written by the lieutenant governor of Michigan, who was, as it was charged, a partisan friend of one of the other candidates in the primary, was printed at a time when the people of the State had full knowledge of what was going on and before the primary, and the result was an overwhelming majority on the Republican ticket for Mr. Newberry, he receiving more votes, I am informed, than Mr. Ford received on both Democratic and Republican tickets.

I am not at this time going into the qualifications of Mr. Ford in connection with his attitude on the war or as a statesman, nor try to discover the peculiar reasons which must have actuated the President in putting him forward as an administration candidate in Michigan, whose loyalty has never been questioned. I simply desire to state that Mr. Newberry did not, as I understand, come into the State during his campaign and had nothing to do with it during the primary. I know who did have. Mr. Paul H. King, a man whom I have known for years, one of the cleanest and best young men in Michigan, a man in whom everybody who has ever known him has confidence, had charge of the campaign. He is familiar with our State and Federal statutes, and I can not believe that he did or permitted to be done any unlawful act. No one regrets more than I do that so much money was used, and I will vote to make such use unlawful; but as between Mr. Ford and Mr. Newberry the people made no mistake in their choice. It was the natural, the inevitable, one, and if no law was violated which resulted in Mr. Newberry's election the Senate has no business to contribute to his opponent's success.

I repeat that I regret exceedingly that it should have been thought advisable on the part of anybody to spend $176,000 in the Michigan primary. I happen to know, however, that that expenditure was a detriment to Mr. Newberry rather than a benefit. This letter by Dickinson was circulated in the campaign—a people's campaign—and Mr. Newberry's opponents made the use of money in his campaign their issue. The voters knew all about it. I know this expenditure was a detriment to Mr. Newberry, because I heard it discussed frequently, and generally deprecated, although I heard of no charge that corruption had been practiced. No one questioned Mr. Newberry's honesty, ability, or patriotism. The newspapers carried much advertisement of this candidate, unnecessary, as I believe, but legal, as I am informed.

I am not objecting to an investigation at the proper time. Indeed, I would be glad to have a full and complete investigation, and if Mr. Newberry shall receive a certificate of election in November and charges are preferred against his title, I will not only vote to investigate but I will vote to unseat him if corruption which secured his nomination is proven. Now, however, in the midst of an election campaign a propaganda which failed in the primary, because the people believed they saw the animus back of it and what the object was, is to be carried further, not so much to uncover and punish corruption but to elect Mr. Newberry's opponent. An investigation after election would not inure to the benefit of any candidate, and the Committee on Privileges and Elections is to pursue an unusual course and in advance investigate this case. There is no law for this action, but later, if Mr. Newberry is elected, the Senate, being judge of its Members' qualifications, can pass upon them.

There will be time enough for the Senate to act when this candidate presents himself to take the oath of office, when his certificate is issued, if he shall be elected. Then will be the proper time to air this campaign issue. I am wondering why the Senator is not exercised over the condition in West Virginia, where equally gross charges against the successful Democratic candidate are made.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if I understand the scope of this resolution, it is not confined to Michigan, but takes in West Virginia and perhaps my own State. The Democratic candidate from West Virginia, I understand, if rumor is to be credited at all, will be subject to the terms of this resolution if it shall be enacted by the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That may be; but the Michigan case is the only one specified; and yet, in spite of all the protestations—and I do not wish to question the statements of Senators—the fact yet remains with me that this is in furtherance of the scheme which originated in the White House to call Mr. Ford in and induce him to enter this race for the Senate in Michigan. The administration wants a Senator from Michigan who will affiliate with the Democratic Party. I do not believe it will succeed. I want the facts known at the proper time. The question is, Will the Senate of the United States seat an improperly elected candidate? I will join, I repeat, even as against a man from my own State, in voting to unseat or to refuse a seat to a candidate who is proven to have been nominated or elected illegally; but this, I submit, is an unusual and unwarranted course of procedure. In the midst of a political campaign is not the proper time. The publication of these charges in the RECORD is for the purpose of free circulation. It is unworthy politics and will fail, however, because these charges were known in Michigan all during the primary campaign. The people in November will determine whether or not they believe there has been fraud. An enemy of Mr. Newberry said that if he received the nomination that nomination would be tested. The committee of the Senate propose to make that threat good. You had better let the people pass upon these charges in November before you act.

I understand that this resolution must go to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has gone first to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for a determination as to whether they want to report it, and then it must go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The practical object has been accomplished thus far, in giving notice to the country through the RECORD, and especially to the people in the State of Michigan, that the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections questions the right of their choice to run in the coming election. When further action is taken, I perhaps shall have something further to say upon the subject.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, my distinguished friend "doth protest too much." When he charges that this resolution was inspired because of an improper motive, I hardly think he intended to say that, or intended the effect of his words. Nothing that I have said, and nothing that I have done, justifies that construction. I submit that if the question arises as to whether I or the Senator from Michigan made a political speech there will be little difficulty in determining it.

The Senator from Michigan has suggested that he does not approve the expenditure of $176,000. That does him credit. I would not have expected him to take any other position than that. It now appears that $176,000 has been expended, and the Senator from Michigan does not approve it. Why? Is it because he thinks it is wrong or right? If wrong, then why should it not be investigated in time?

The precedents are all against the Senator. I myself served on a committee in the presidential campaign in 1912 when the subject matter under investigation was the expenditures in presidential campaigns. I do not know that there was any serious objection to that investigation at that time.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. POMERENE. Pardon me just a minute. When the Senator makes the statement that this investigation was prompted at the White House, that was wholly gratuitous on his part. It is not true.

I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Was that investigation of presidential campaign expenditures an investigation of the campaign then in progress?

Mr. POMERENE. It was. The resolution as first presented in the Senate was to apply to previous campaigns.

Mr. LODGE. That was my memory.

Mr. POMERENE. An amendment was made on the floor extending it to the then current campaign.

Mr. LODGE. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. POMERENE. And those expenditures were inquired into by the committee. Witnesses came to testify concerning the expenditures by and on behalf of candidates of each of the three parties.

Mr. LODGE. I recall the investigation. It was purely political. I do not see myself, and never have been able to see, what possible jurisdiction the Senate had to investigate the election expenses of primaries or any other elections until they came before the Senate for action. We are not conducting a general inquest.

Mr. POMERENE. That may or may not be the correct view. I only know what the Senate has done in the past, and I accept full responsibility for presenting this resolution, because I believe it ought to be presented. That is all I care to say.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I desire to correct the statement made by the Senator from Ohio. I did not say that this investigation originated in the White House. I said the candidacy of Mr. Ford originaed in the White House.

Mr. LODGE. Of course it did.

Mr. OWEN. I think the Senator will want to correct the statement made by him, because he said the scheme originated in the White House if I remember correctly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. For the candidacy of Mr. Ford. That is what I mean.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I accept the correction made by the Senator; but I think, if he will look at the report of his remarks, he will find that I did not misstate his position.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I want to say that if we are going on to things beyond our jurisdiction, and enter into campaign expenditures for political purposes, I think we shall have to examine them all. The reports from West Virginia of the struggle there between two eminent Democrats are quite as glowing, in a money way, as those from Michigan; and I think we had better investigate them all. I think it is useless politically, and I think it is beyond our jurisdiction anyway.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if the Senator will look at the second paragraph of the preamble he will discover that that was within the contemplation of the proponent of the resolution.

Mr. LODGE. I discovered it, Mr. President, while reading the second paragraph, but I noticed that the name of West Virginia was not printed in the resolution; and I am inclined to think it will be before we get through.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, it was not printed there because I had no detailed information upon that subject. The other was beyond the peradventure of dispute.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, with reference to the statement that I made, I overheard the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] say a moment ago that I did make the statement that the proposal for an investigation originated in the White House. If I made that statement, I desire permission to change the RECORD in that respect.

Mr. THOMAS. I also said that I knew the Senator did not intend the statement.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I know the Senator did; but I do not wish to be misunderstood, because my expression in connection with Mr. Ford's candidacy made clearly evident what I intended.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, with reference to the resolution which has just been referred to, I want to say that I am a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. With reference to the West Virginia case, for example, and with reference to the Michigan case, it is understood that charges have been made in West Virginia against the successful candidate that he spent an enormous amount of money. The same charges were made against the candidate in Michigan. The election is now pending. The candidate in West Virginia is serving his country in France; but he must conduct his campaign, or withdraw from it under the stigma of being investigated now by the Senate of the United States, under the statement that has been made. He must have it said of him by his political opponents or by his personal enemies in his State, as must be the case in Michigan, that the Senate of the United States has already paid enough attention to the charges made through the public press or elsewhere to place under investigation his right to occupy a seat in the Senate—his title, in the event it is finally conferred upon him by the people of a sovereign State. It will be said: "That right is now under investigation; and what assurance have you that if this man is elected he will be allowed by that holier-than-thou body to take his seat?"

This is exactly the situation. I deprecate this condition. In so far as I am personally concerned, it matters not to me at all. In my own State the condition to-day is that there are three or four candidates for the nomination upon one ticket. One of them is conducting, through the public press, such a campaign as we have never had in my State before, by paid advertisements in the public press, perfectly legitimately; and I want it understood here and now that as a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections I would resent any statement reflecting upon that gentleman or the methods which he is now using. He has a perfect right to advertise in every paper in the State if he so desires, and he is doing it, with full-page advertisements. What the cost may be, I do not know. I regard it as a perfectly legitimate method of canvassing; and unless it can be shown that one of the men referred to here whom we are now to investigate, one of these candidates, has so expended his money corruptly as to buy a paper which was against him, I say he had a perfect right to do so; and I am speaking now as a member of the committee. This would be my judgment. Therefore, I presume that I would be disqualified, because I am not a fully qualified member of the Congressional Salvation Army. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I desire to state something further, which has been brought to my mind by the statement of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. Newberry, who has been insidiously attacked here, is commander of the third naval district in New York. He has been since the war began, when he enlisted. He has devoted his time entirely to the duties that he owed his country. He has two sons, one of whom is in the Army and the other is in the Navy. I do not care to make any invidious comparisons with the man who ran against him, who was recommended for the place, and whom—whether it is intended or not—it is expected that this investigation will benefit. These facts will all be disclosed, because if the committee does investigate Mr. Newberry's nomination, it must in fairness disclose all the conditions attending the late Michigan primary.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I merely want to observe that while it is legitimate, in the sense that it is not a violation of statute law, to use newspaper advertising on a large scale, there comes a point where the use of money in advertising in the newspapers may become against the public interest. It may be grossly unfair to other candidates who do not have the means of obtaining that publicity. It only emphasizes the need for a publicity pamphlet, published at the public expense, where each candidate may have an equal show before the electorate.

It is obviously unfair that Mr. Newberry's friends should spend confessedly $176,000—for newspaper advertising, I suppose, in the main—or $500,000, as charged against them by those who have criticized Mr. Newberry's campaign. When money is used on so large a scale it can influence the press through the business office; and money ought not to be used for advertising on such a scale that the business office may have weight with the editorial staff in commenting on candidates. The law ought to limit the amount that can be expended per capita if individuals are going to be permitted to spend money in this wholesale way, and I think somewhat shameless way, because there is a point beyond which it ought not to be permitted to go, and where the conscience of men and the ethical sense of men will feel that certain expenditures are not in the public interest.

I do not know the gentleman whose campaign has been under discussion, but I think I do know something of Mr. Ford. I do not believe that Mr. Ford's loyalty should be questioned because of his mad hope to affect the opinion of the German Kaiser. He had an idea that the Bengal tiger was a house cat, and he made a very great error in any such conception; but I do not think anyone should question his loyalty.

Another thing: The instrumentalities built up by this great constructive force in the building of ships and in the building of other machinery of war are of the very first magnitude; and the employment of a man of this kind in such a service would be far more important that having him or his son either digging a trench.

The dangers of war can not be distributed per capita. Many men think that that ought to be the rule. The rule of service is where men can serve their Nation best, whatever the danger that may be incurred.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Who is to determine that?

Mr. OWEN. The proper authorities, I think.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The proper authority determined that Mr. Edsel Ford—and I take it the Senator has him in mind—was not entitled to exemption and did not grant him exemption. But he was not taken. He made an appeal to the President, who held the matter in abeyance until an order was issued by the Provost Marshal to the effect that those conscripts who were married, regardless of whether they had dependents or not, should be put in a deferred class. Mr. Edsel Ford, the local board had determined, was not entitled to exemption under the law which took the sons of less influential fathers.

Mr. OWEN. Of course, the local board and then the board of appeals determine upon a question of that character. I do not know anything about the individual. I only speak of the industrial exemptions, which have been found necessary in France, in Great Britain, and in the United States, because the men who are at the front must be supplied with the materials of war and with the machinery of war. I merely made that comment because the Senator's observation would seem to reflect on the loyalty of the son as well as on the loyalty of the father.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I merely wish to say a word, because the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has been charged with playing politics in the introduction of this resolution. I think those who know the Senator from Ohio closely know that that would be unworthy of him. I know that there has been no politics whatever in it. The Senator from Ohio talked with some Republican Senators on the committee, and they agreed with him that the resolution should be introduced.

Outside of all question, Mr. President, if this enormous expenditure of money in senatorial campaigns is to go on without any challenge by Congress, then the poor man has no chance ever to secure a seat in this body, and simply the rich can purchase a seat here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The morning hour is concluded.

Mr. McCUMBER. I gave notice that at the close of the morning hour I would discuss certain peace propositions made by the German Kaiser, but the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] desires to leave very shortly and asked me to yield to him that he may discuss another subject before I begin. I gladly yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. WEEKS obtained the floor.

Mr. THOMPSON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

GERMAN SUBMARINE WARFARE.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I simply wish to announce that on to-morrow, Wednesday, September 18, following the morning business, if I can properly obtain the floor, I desire to address the Senate briefly on the question of German submarine warfare.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood that the Senate was going to adjourn over until Thursday. Let the Senator give the notice for the next meeting of the Senate.

Mr. THOMPSON. I talked with the floor leader, and he said there would be a session to-morrow, but Thursday will suit me just as well as to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. It does not make any difference whether the notice is for to-morrow or Thursday, the next session of the Senate will cover it.

Mr. THOMPSON. Very well, I give the notice for the next session of the Senate, changing the announcement in that particular.

SERIAL BOND ISSUES.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, our Government is about to issue a fourth liberty loan, larger than any of the previous issues, and therefore a greater strain on the financial resources of the country than we have had heretofore to meet. I assume that the country will respond as patriotically in this instance as it has in the past, and that there will be no question about a full subscription to the $6,000,000,000 of bonds which are to be offered to the public. I am interested in the manner of issuing these bonds, and it is that question which I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate. It is an inopportune time, I am sure, if an audience is expected on the floor of the Senate, but it will be a matter of record, which, I think, may justify the effort.

In February last year, when the finance bill of that month was under consideration, I submitted to the Senate some observations, included in which was a statement relating to the manner of issuing bonds in serial form. I thought at the time, in fact I was confident at the time, that many Senators who had not had the opportunity to study this question were impressed with the value of the suggestion; but for some reason of which I am not informed the Treasury Department decided not to take advantage of the forms and figures which had been prepared and which were included in the RECORD. It is to once more see if I can not obtain enough interest in this important subject, which, in my judgment, will save more money than all the savings that can be made between now and the end of the war without in any way impairing the possibility of placing loans that I now address the Senate.

One of the striking actions taken in connection with that bill was the refunding of the bonded indebtedness incurred in prosecuting the Spanish-American War. Some sixty-eight millions of bonds were issued at the time of the Spanish War to supplement the additional taxation which was laid to provide for the expenditures incident to that conflict. Those bonds were to mature in 20 years, and the provision was made for their renewal for 50 years. In other words, and there could be no better example of the folly of such a system, the grandchildren or the great grandchildren of those who were active in affairs in 1898 are going to be obliged to either pay for the expenses of a small war fought at that time or renew again the indebtedness then incurred, and all the generations living between 1898 and 1968 will have to bear the burden of paying the interest on that indebtedness. There are three well-known methods of issuing public indebtedness, as far as the method relates to payment and maturity:

First. In the form which I have just illustrated, no part of the indebtedness being paid or provided for until the maturity of the entire loan;

Second. Providing for a sinking fund sufficient to meet the payment of the loan at maturity; and Third. Providing for an annual contribution in the form of an installment sufficient to pay not only the interest for that year, but a proportional part of the indebtedness, so that an equal contribution each year, until the maturity of the debt, will pay the entire issue in annual contributions. Or, in other words, the repayment of the loan in annual installments, the amount being collected equal to a definite part of the loan, dependent on the number of years it has to run.

Until 20 or 25 years ago the ordinary method of overcoming the various serious objections of having an entire loan come due at one time without any provision for its payment was provided for through sinking-fund provisions; that is, the purchase of securities of sufficient amount in each year to provide a fund which would pay the entire debt at maturity. There have been so many failures of sinking-fund provisions that long ago the method was recognized as an uncertain and insecure policy to follow. No better illustration could be given of this failure to operate than that in the case of our own Government. When the Civil War bonds were issued, about two and a half billions of them, provision was made for a sinking fund which would retire them within the course of a reasonable number of years. The revenues which followed the Civil War for 20 or 25 years were so redundant that it was not necessary to apply the sinking fund, but the Treasury Department purchased bonds from time to time, so that the entire issue was reduced as early as 1890 to about one billion. Since that time the sinking-fund requirements were not put into operation for various reasons, one being that, due to one of the methods followed by us in issuing circulation, it was necessary to use the entire issue of Government bonds as a basis for our circulation.

In any case no party or no set of men paid very much attention to this sinking fund, and then, too, there is another very definite objection to the operation of a sinking fund in case of large indebtedness. It is difficult to get bonds suitable for trustee purposes sufficient to make ample provision for a large loan, and of course that would be absolutely impossible in case of the enormous loans that are issued to prosecute the present war. Moreover, the undesirability of a sinking fund for our national debt has already been recognized by the repeal of the existing law requiring the establishment and maintenance of a sinking fund. The change made is in this language:

In lieu thereof the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to use, in his discretion, the surplus moneys in the Treasury from time to time or such portion thereof, as he may deem proper for the purchase or redemption of the outstanding obligations of the United States, and the obligations so purchased or redeemed shall be canceled and retired and their respective amounts shall be deducted from the outstanding principal of the public debt.

Of course it is better to repeal a provision of law which is not being observed than to leave it on the statute books, because a failure to enforce a law begets an indifference to all law and is harmful as a public policy, but it will be seen that in this provision, which has received the sanction of Congress, no definite action is taken to provide for our indebtedness, and there is a distinct disadvantage in leaving in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury such a power as this. One Secretary might very well have definite opinions relating to the desirability of proposing a large annual budget from which he would anticipate a large amount to pay indebtedness, while another Secretary might take a directly contrary view, and as a result have very little available for the payment of indebtedness. Then, again, this is also true, that a large surplus in the Treasury is a temptation for excessive and frequently unlicensed public expenditures, suggesting undertakings which in the ordinary course would not be thought of, so that when we reach the distinction of having a real national budget system, instead of leaving it optional with the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out his personal views there should be definite and distinct provision for the raising of enough additional money to that required in carrying on our annual operations to make suitable provision for retirement of a part of the national indebtedness. There were those at the beginning of this war who argued that the larger part if not the entire expenditures of the war should be paid from moneys raised by taxation. Of course, the volume of expenditures has become so large that this would be impossible, even if it were believed by a majority that it was good public policy, but the contention which was made by the advocates following that method—that it is undesirable to extend indefinitely the costs of a war—has very much weight. We have no means of knowing what the extraordinary expenses of the Government will be in the generations to follow, and, in my judgment, the country at the end of this war will be strong and responsive enough so that there will be no hesitation about undertaking the payment of a proportional amount of the war debt annually. There is another advantage which I think should not be lost sight of in paying a portion of the indebtedness annually. Following that course will release the amount paid, making it available to use in legitimate enterprises. If the serial system were not adopted this would be impossible and would be particularly embarrassing in the methods used in providing sinking funds, because neither would the national indebtedness be paid nor would the indebtedness carried in the sinking fund for which provision might be made if it were not used in that way. Moreover, there is always more or less loss in the case of sinking-fund operations.

Take a case, for example, like the city of New York. I understand the amount of uninvested money belonging to its various sinking funds averages as much as $10,000,000. The bank rate of interest obtained on this uninvested money can not be more than about one-half of the rate of interest carried by the outstanding bonds, so that there is a very definite loss at all times for this reason, and the difficulty of obtaining suitable bonds to put into a sinking fund and the loss of interest on a part, if not on the entire fund, has long ago convinced thoughtful men, and especially skilled accountants, that it is not the most economical method to follow in conducting municipal or other public finances. This was recognized many years ago in the State of Massachusetts, and as early as 1906 a law was passed compelling the abandoning of the sinking-fund method in issuing State indebtedness and substituting for it serial bonds. Massachusetts has a very large gross debt, aggregating about $125,000,000, being second in the size of its debt to the State of New York and having the largest per capita debt of any State in the country. So it was, of course, an important question in that Commonwealth and was solved by the legislation to which I have referred after mature and serious consideration. Moreover, a few years later a law was passed by the Massachusetts Legislature compelling municipalities in that State to issue serial bonds, so that now all public indebtedness in Massachusetts is issued under the serial form. That Commonwealth is not alone in adopting this system. It has been done by many other States and local communities. I have recently had brought to my attention a statement made by the commissioner of finance of the city of Toronto, Canada, in which he made a very strong argument in favor of serial bonds. A brief statement of the results in the case to which he refers may not be out of place. The total amount of debenture issue in Toronto in 1916 aggregated $12,385,914.58, these debentures running from 3 to 33 years. The amount of levy for interest and principal, according to the sinking-fund method, in order to retire this indebtedness would aggregate $1,589,323.59 annually. By the serial bond method the amount required would be $1,500,826.17, showing an annual saving of $88,497.42, or a saving in the whole term of the loan of $1,291,537.75. It will be noted that this is simply a comparison between the sinking fund and the serial bond methods. The advantage to be obtained in serial bond form of issuing indebtedness over that maturing at one time and without any provision for its payment can be better demonstrated by figures, which I will submit a little later in another way. I regret exceedingly that in issuing the three series of liberty bonds which have already been sold to the public that action has not been taken to adopt the serial system, because while in time of war it is necessary to act with very little regard to the cost of any definite action, yet the time will come, and it will come soon, when the people of the country are going to demand an accounting, and when there has been a failure to take advantage of a sound economic policy, without some very substantial reason for such failure, not only will the administration be criticized for this neglect, but Congress as well. When it is so easy to demonstrate, in the issuing of the great volumes of indebtedness which we have done and must continue to do until the end of the war, that by following the serial method the Government will save hundreds of millions, yes, actually billions, there can not be any very good excuse given for failing to adopt that policy.

Very much of the information which I have received on the subject of serial bonds has been furnished me by Mr. Alfred D. Chandler, a well-known citizen of Brookline, Mass., who has given long and intelligent study to this question and who probably knows more about it than any man in the United States, but there are others who have given the subject consideration and who coincide with his views. In fact I do not find any trained accountant who does not agree with the conclusions which Mr. Chandler reaches in the figures which I will later submit. In order to indicate how general the practice of issuing serial bonds is upheld I quote from Prof. Seligman, the well-known professor of political economy at Columbia University, in an article published in the New York Times of April 15, 1917. He said, "One conclusion is certain, namely, that from the very time of issue adequate provision should be made for an annual amortizatiton quota so arranged that at the expiration of the life of the loan the entire loan will be virtually extinguished. It would be deplorable in the extreme if such gigantic issues as we have in contemplation were to be made with the simple prospect of refunding the loans at some future time. A perpetual debt or even a long debt must be avoided at all hazards." And Prof. Henry C. Adams, the well-known statistician, in his Science of Finance refers to this issue as follows: "The payment of the principal of a debt tends neither to impoverish a nation nor to retard its development, but, on the other hand, the maintenance of the principal and the constant increase of the interest tend to cripple the productive capacity of a people."

Moreover, very large continuing national indebtedness has a tendency to increase inflation and maintain it in normal times. It was on April 2, 1918, that President Wilson referred to this subject in an address in which he said, "It is our duty, I most respectfully urge, to protect our people so far as we may against the very serious hardships and evils which would be likely to arise out of the inflation which would be produced by vast loans." These vast loans are necessary. All of the money which can be raised from taxation, following the methods which have been adopted, will be raised in the finance bill this year and therefore we want to avoid as far as may be done the danger to which the President refers by reducing our indebtedness as rapidly as it is possible after the termination of the war. No preparation has been made for this in the three issues of bonds already placed. Neither the sinking fund nor the serial form of issuing indebtedness has been adopted. The first issue of 3½ per cent bonds runs 30 years, and is redeemable after 15 years, so that no part of that indebtedness can be paid, without going into the market to make purchases, before the 15th of June, 1932. The second liberty bond issue of 4 per cent bonds matures in 25 years, and is redeemable after 10 years, so that no part of that loan will be available for payment until November 15, 1927. The third issue of 4¼ per cent liberty bonds is made payable in 10 years, and is not subject to prior call, so that no part of this indebtedness will be due or available for payment before September 15, 1928. In other words, no part of this war indebtedness is available for payment within 10 years. The only recourse the Government will have will be to go into the market to purchase bonds, in which case it will be at the mercy of the bondholder and will be quite likely to pay excessive prices when it should be able to purchase the bonds at par. I now wish to call attention to the definite figures which will illustrate the utter folly of failing to adopt an approved method of issuing the bonds covering our national indebtedness, and I take for this purpose the $6,000,000,000 loan which is about to be issued at 4¼ per cent interest and compare the result from the issuing of this loan as a single-maturity issue with that under the partial-payment method, using different rates of interest and the issue running for different terms.

I do not intend to read all these figures to the Senate, but I ask permission to put them into the RECORD to complete the statement which I am making.

When you stop to consider that there is a saving of more than the face of the entire issue if the bonds are issued by the single-maturity and partial-payment method in 50 years, or $6,247,000,000, what possible reason can there be for not adopting this system?

I wish, Mr. President, to add to this record of figures which I prepared, and which I wish to submit, another statement, relating to partial payments, which I think has particular force, because it shows exactly what will have to be done each year in order to pay the debt in full. Take the $6,000,000,000 issue which we are now considering, the appropriation to run for 25 years. The appropriation for the first year for interest is $255,000,000; for principal and interest combined, $495,000,000. But each year the amount of interest decreases, so that the total appropriation will be decreased by the amount of interest which would have been required to pay the amount of the loan so reduced the previous year; or, in other words, if this loan ran for 25 years, by the partial-payment method there would be a saving of $117,600,000 annually and the entire debt would be paid at the end of that time, while in the other case there would be caused not only a payment of that additional amount, but the debt would be in full force at the end of 25 years. I ask permission to put all of those figures in the RECORD, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NUGENT in the chair). Without objection, permission to do so is granted.

The figures referred to are as follows:

Cost, by partial payments, of $6,000,000,000 4½ per cent, 25 years, one twenty-fifth, or $240,000,000, payable each year.

Mr. WEEKS. There has been objection on the part of a few individuals to the issuing of national bonds to the public in serial form on the ground that different dates of maturity would naturally sell at different prices and that therefore one subscriber would have an advantage over another. I think there is no particular validity in this objection. It might occur under some circumstances but in these days serial issues of bonds sell quite as well as do an issue maturing at one time. There are so many forms of investment requiring different maturities and especially if provision must be made for sinking-fund payments, that bond dealers of long experience have, I think, without exception come to the conclusion that as high a price is obtained for a serial issue as for a single-maturity issue, and I do not think in the present temper of the public that there will be any serious objection even if the same issue of bonds of different maturities sold at a somewhat different price. Moreover, it would not be necessary to adopt such an expedient as the one recently suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury to stabilize outstanding issues of bonds as well as to induce additional subscriptions. I am not criticizing his suggestion nor his desire to aid as far as possible the sale of the fourth liberty loan but am simply calling attention to the fact that a serial-bond issue would promote uniformity of bond quotations in the bond market and therefore provide for their automatic stabilization. It has been suggested that a large fund be furnished the Secretary of the Treasury, taken presumably from borrowed money instead of taxes, for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of the Treasury to stabilize bond prices. If the method to be followed in this case conforms in any degree with the usual stock-market methods of supporting stocks it would have as a result, in my opinion, a very demoralizing effect on bond prices rather than a stimulating one. We should not lose sight of the fact that every effort should be made to strengthen the Nation's credit, for by so doing we add an additional surety to our position as a military as well as a commercial power, and a large indebtedness for which no provision has been made for payment can not but produce a bad impression and will result in lessening the Nation's credit. Moreover, bonds issued under the serial method properly and justly distributes the cost of the war over the time it is determined as being necessary to pay the entire indebtedness. No part of this or succeeding generations until the entire indebtedness is paid will be able to escape its measure of the responsibility and that in itself will have a good effect on the Nation and a stabilizing effect on the price of bonds. We are necessarily spending enormous sums of money and there should be no hesitation to make every expenditure which is legitimate, but there should be no opportunity lost to make a saving wherever it can be done without in any degree lessening the effectiveness of the prosecution of the war, and I maintain that all of the methods combined which might be discovered to produce economies in our expenditures would not equal the saving that can be made to the Government if the serial-bond method is adopted. While it may be said that the printing of the bonds for the fourth liberty loan has already been undertaken, even if it has the plates and every other preparatory step which may have been made could be very well thrown away to bring about the enormous savings evidenced by the figures which I have submitted, the correctness of which I believe can not be successfully disputed.

THE KAISER'S PEACE PLEA.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, on the 12th day of September, 1918, Emperor William of Germany made an address to the Krupp munition workers at Essen. I desire to place in the RECORD such excerpts from that address as I have marked and to respond to some of them at this time. I wish first to read one excerpt from this address, as follows:

> Every one of you in the remotest corner of the fatherland knows that I left no stone unturned to shorten the war as far as possible for you and your people and for the entire civilized European world. In December, 1916, I presented the enemy public with a clear and unambiguous offer of peace in the name of the German Empire and my allies. Jeers, mockery, and contempt were the answer.

READY TO ACCEPT PEACE.

> God above knows my sense of responsibility. Repeatedly during the past months the responsible leaders of the imperial government have unambiguously given to understand, to every one who wished to understand, that we are at all times ready to offer the hand to peace.

Mr. President, this renewed bid for peace, taken in conjunction with the suggestions made by the Austrian Government, demands, it seems to me, some restatement of our case in addition to what has been made by the President of the United States and on the floor of the Senate. I wish to address myself to certain features that would come under the general term of reparation features which were not touched upon by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] in his able address the other day nor by anyone else who has discussed the subject of peace terms.

Mr. President, I ask permission to insert in the RECORD without reading certain other excerpts which I have marked.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

> Many among you have often asked themselves during this long war, "How did such a thing happen? Why did we have to undergo such a thing after 40 years of peace?" I think it is a question well worthy of an answer and which must be answered for the future—for our children and our grandchildren.

I have thought long on the matter and have come to the following answer:

In this world good clashes with evil. That is how things have been ordered from On High—the yes and the no; the no of the doubting mind against the yes of the creative mind; the no of the pessimist against the yes of the optimist; the no of the unbeliever against the yes of the champion of faith; the yes of heaven against the no of hell.

PRODUCT OF GREAT NEGATION.

You will acknowledge that I am right in describing this war as the product of a great negation. And do you ask what negation it is? It is the negation of the German people's right to existence. It is the negation of all our kultur, a negation of our achievements, of all our work.

The German people was industrious, meditative, assiduous, imaginative in all domains. It worked with body and soul. But there were people who did not wish to work, but to rest on their laurels. Those were our enemies. We got close to them through our profitable work and the development of our industry, science, and art; through our popular education and social legislation. Thereby our people throve, and then came envy.

"ENVY INDUCED FOE TO FIGHT."

Envy induced our enemies to fight, and war came upon us. And now when our opponents see that their hopes have been deceptive and how our mighty generals, after whom your new workshops are rightly named, have dealt them blow upon blow, hatred springs up. We only know the honest wrath which deals the enemy the blow, but when he lies prostrate and bleeding we extend to him our hand and see to his recovery.

Hatred manifests itself only among peoples who feel themselves beaten. If, therefore, such terrible hatred exists among our enemies it owes its origin to the fact that their calculations have been wrong.

REFERENCE TO RUSSIA.

And now, my friends, let me draw your attention to something more. You have read what recently happened in Moscow—the mighty conspiracy against the present government. The parliamentary-governed, democratic British nation has endeavored to overthrow the ultrademocratic government which the Russian people had begun to construct, because this government, considering the interests of its fatherland, wishes to maintain its people in the peace for which it clamors.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the king of brute force and emperor of unbridled militarism, with fingers still dripping with the blood of millions of men, women, and babes, with an arrogance in keeping with his merciless policies, and with a cunning and deception in harmony with all the startling disclosures of his treacherous international diplomacy, again appeals to his own people for renewed allegiance to his base cause and to neutrals and pacifists to stay the avenging arm of justice.

I propose to place in the RECORD the heart response of one American citizen to this plea for a peace conference—the sentiments which I know reflect the conscience and conviction of every American who loves justice and hates tyranny and oppression.

The Kaiser in his speech to the Krupp gun workers says he wants peace. He can have it to-day. But he can have only a just and righteous peace. A peace that is not both righteous and permanent, a peace that imposes no punishment on the perpetrator of the most atrocious crime in the history of the world, a peace that leaves such a criminal with such criminal tendencies in a position to again perpetrate a like crime would be worse than a sham; it would be an act of treason against humanity itself.

This is the American answer to you, most august monarch of autocratic militarism, you who appeal for a cessation of this war, a war which you and you alone launched on an unprepared and a defenseless world.

The press reports attribute to you these words:

Many among you have often asked yourselves during the long war, "How did such a thing happen? Why did we have to undergo such a thing after 40 years of peace?" I think it is a question well worthy of an answer and which must be answered for the future—for our children and for our grandchildren. I have thought long on the matter and have come to the following answer.

Then, after indulging in a weak attempt at camouflage, you record this as your conclusion:

Envy induced our enemies to fight, and war came upon us.

Is it possible that you have so concealed the truth from the German people that such a cheap and silly falsehood can find lodgment in their minds? You and your autocratic and arrogant military caste are solely responsible for this holocaust of blood and misery. The German people are responsible only in that they have submitted their bodies and lives, mere pawns on the chessboard of aristocratic ambitions, to be sacrificed for the perpetuation and glory of his majesty the Emperor.

"Envy induced our enemies to fight, and war came upon us." What a monstrous falsehood! For 40 years German militarism had been preparing to launch this war. Your military statesmen declared this purpose. Your writers published their schemes for world conquest. They played upon the greed of your merchants and the vanity of your people. During all these 40 years you have been envious of Great Britain's sea power and her success in colonizing and binding to her great sections of the earth. You and your coterie have published volume after volume of literature declaring it a national duty to destroy the British Empire. You evolved the scheme of uniting into one realm all the territory of central Europe, that it might give you a power to crush and enslave every weaker nation of Europe, to dominate and conquer India, and finally to control the destinies of South America. You even formed companies which were to exploit India and bring its wealth to the fatherland.

Your military zealots have always been dissatisfied with the toll of a billion dollars imposed upon defeated France in 1870, in addition to the seizure of her two fairest Provinces. You had determined that in this war your crushed and subjugated enemies should pay all the cost of their very undoing. Wherever you have succeeded, whatever territory you have brought under your control, you have robbed the people of their wealth and made slaves of their populations. If you should succeed in this war, the indemnities you would impose would appall the world. But a just God, whose justice you have slandered in this impious and brutal war, will never allow you to perpetrate your purpose upon the world.

Hatred manifests itself only among peoples who feel themselves beaten. If, therefore, such terrible hatred exists among our enemies, it owes its origin to the fact that their calculations have been wrong.

You talk of hatred! You, the embodiment of the very soul of hate, accuse your enemies of hating you! Who originated your Hymn of Hate? Who but your military autocracy? Who has made it a national anthem? You, and you alone. Is it possible that you expect the world to refrain from hating you for making such a war and for your atrocious methods of conducting it? Yes; it is true that the world does hate you, but it hates you for the crimes you have committed. The world will be a lost world when it ceases to grow in hate of hate, when it ceases to hate the carnivorous beast or despise the cunning, poisonous serpent.

By your shocking orders, by your brutal conquests, by your murder of children, by your ravishment of women, encouraged, yes, even ordered, by you, you have incurred the hatred of the civilized world.

You now appeal to the German people to sustain you—you who have cast a blot of shame upon the German name which centuries can not eradicate. The German character is not naturally brutal, but rather kind and sympathetic. During war that savagery in human nature which centuries of civilization have failed to eliminate must in the heat of conflict, in the excitement of battle, be held down by the strong arm of military discipline. Every other civilized nation guards against this danger. You encourage and command it, seeking to awe into submission by terror and savagery. Compare your orders and your conduct in this war with those of our American Expeditionary Force. An American soldier found guilty of assault upon a woman is court-martialed and shot. You have never punished one of those guilty of the most hideous crimes against helpless men, women, and even babies, but have decorated them with the highest order of your realm. What more inhuman character could be conceived than that which orders a public holiday that the children in your schools may celebrate the sinking of the Lusitania in a most cowardly and brutal way, teaching your immature children to glory in the tears and frenzied gasps of agonized mothers as they sink beneath the waves clasping their silken-haired babies in their arms?

Yes; the world does hate you for your philosophy that recognizes might above right, and this hatred is a most righteous hatred.

I repeat, the German people are responsible for this war only to the extent that they have allowed this monster of militarism, with its world-domination ideas, to reach its octopus tentacles into the body and soul of a people and hold them in its evil grasp. You prate of German "kultur." In science, in philosophy, in literature, in poetry, in music, Germany may well compare with any other nation in the world. But in government, in the recognition of the sacred rights of the individual, she is 500 years behind the nations she would destroy. Since the days of Magna Charta the inalienable rights of the English people have been maintained and reinvigorated in every bloody struggle for their defense. Germany, on the other hand, has submitted to a military autocracy more arrogant and tyrannical in its power than that in any other country on earth. When Prussia, Austria, and Russia allied themselves to destroy representative government in the world, their plea to the King of England to join them was met by his reply that England was a constitutional government and the people ruled. That little island which for 40 years you have declared again and again must be destroyed, because it was in your way, an obstacle to the expansion of your "kultur," is the same little island that refused to join you in the destruction of representative government in the world—refused to assist you to quench the then flickering flame of liberty. That little island has been the mother of liberty throughout the world. That little island has ever maintained that the State exists for the people and is subject to them, while your doctrine of force and murder is that the people exist only for the power of the State and the aggrandizement of its divinely appointed ruler.

Your doctrine of the divine right of kings has maintained upon the German throne the most brutal, arrogant, and insane tyrants that have cursed the earth. It has maintained upon the throne a dynasty in whose veins the germ of insanity has ever been present. From the time the great elector conspired to don the regal robe of kingship, and after achieving his end became obsessed with the malady of military display; from the time the grandfather of Frederick the Great spent his whole time and efforts in the search for giants to fill his armies and satisfy his military craze; from the time the father of Frederick the Great, whose clenched fist struck to insensibility his 16-year-old daughter and whose iron heel kicked and bruised her prostrate body; from the time he so abused and maltreated his son, the heir apparent, that he was compelled to seek shelter from his father's wrath; from the time this father compelled that son to witness the gruesome beheading of his boy companion and friend; from that time down to the present this brutal malady has from time to time broken out in the Hohenzollern dynasty, and has found permanent lodgment in the soul and character of the present war lord of Europe, and manifested itself in his military vanities and in his hatred and contempt of his own mother.

From childhood you have dreamed only of conquest and military glory. As your ancestor, Frederick the Second, declared as principles of international ethics that "if there is anything to be gained by it we will be honest; if deception is necessary, let us be cheats"; that "one takes when one can and one is wrong only when obliged to give back," and, again, "no ministers at home but clerks, no ministers abroad but spies," so in your own reign you have debased the high position of your ambassadors by making them agents of bribery and corruption. You have instructed them in every line of deception and counseled them to murder and pillage. You have filled every country with spies and have conspired to destroy the very nations which gave them shelter and guarded them as an act of international courtesy.

Knowing the baseness of your cause, you have not trusted to the strong arm made stronger by the knowledge of right, but for years you have been preparing to take cowardly advantage of your enemies. You have been making and experimenting with gases with which you hoped to destroy whole armies and cities. You saw and eagerly grasped the opportunity of converting the submarine, designed only to defend coasts or battle against warships, into an undersea monster that could strike unseen and destroy the commerce of the world, and in the exuberance of your expectations concerning the success of this treacherous undersea monster you defied even the great American Nation itself.

You boast of your achievement in Russia. What a boast! Was it your arms or your armies that defeated Russia? No; your gold purchased sedition and destroyed the force of an Empire. What you could not do in open, honorable battle you did succeed in doing by cunning and bribery.

You talk about the enemies of Germany. The real enemies of Germany have been yourself and your arrogant military caste, who have turned the hitherto humane German philosophy into the godless philosophy that force is the only deity, that a fully developed State can be built only on the ruins of another State, that Germany's right to a place in the sun means the right to so dominate all other nations as to deprive them of their equal right to a place in the sun, leaving them cringing, obeisant vassals under the shadow of a mighty Germanic State, and subject to such exploitation, robbery, boundless greed, and illimitable avarice as would necessarily obtain under such a philosophy.

The real enemies of Germany are you and that coterie of pan-Germans who conceived the Mitteleuropa scheme as a first step in world domination, and who, to accomplish such purpose, have directed the scientific powers of the German brain to the one grand purpose of murder—utilized that power intended to bless humanity to curse and kill humanity.

Whatever of brutality there has been in this war, you are its prime and therefore responsible cause. It was you who said to your soldiers as they embarked for China on the occasion of the Boxer rebellion:

> If you come to grips with him (the enemy), be assured quarter will not be given; no prisoners will be taken. Use your weapons in such a way that for a thousand years no Chinese shall dare to look upon a German askance. Be as terrible as Attila's Huns.

And in obedience to your suggestion your soldiers, not of their own volition but under command of your officers, committed such acts of wanton brutality as caused the commander of every other national force to hang his head in shame.

It was you who, in the arrogance of your assumption of partnership with the Almighty, said to your young recruits:

> Recruits, you are now before the consecrated servant of the Lord and before his altar sworn fealty to me. You are still too young to understand the true meaning of what has just been said, but be diligent now and follow the directions and instructions given you. You have sworn loyalty to me; that means, children of my guard, that you are now my soldiers; you have given yourselves up to me, body and soul; there is for you but one enemy, and that is my enemy. In view of the present socialistic agitations, it may come to pass that I shall command you to shoot your own relatives, brothers, yea, parents—which God forbid—but even then you must follow my command without a murmur.

Oh, German people, you with such a record of accomplishment behind you, how is it possible that you can kneel in reverence to one so steeped in egotism, so devoid of humane sensibilities?

It has been you who, in all your utterances, have alluded to Great Britain, whose success at colonization has excited your envy, as "our most-hated enemy." And well you might envy her success in that field of expansion and colonization, for, although she has made errors and her statesmen have sometimes forgotten that the inherent personal rights enjoyed by Britons in their own land were inalienable human rights, applicable to all lands and all peoples, she has, nevertheless, brought liberty and civilization, the rule and law of order, wherever her flag floats. She has made the desert bloom and has banished famine. She has accorded to the black man, the yellow man, the brown man, rights of life and liberty unkown in your colonies, so that to-day in her great stress the sons of her every colony, with the song of Mother of Liberty on their lips, spring to arms in her defense with a loyalty as true as that which burns in the breast of her native sons, while every prince of India lays at her feet his treasure to sustain her cause. Even the sons of the Transvaal, Teutons in blood, after 15 years of British law and British liberty, are to-day fighting her battles in South Africa.

Compare that with your own record of colonization under your rule of force. The first 25 years of your military rule in southwest Africa was an unbroken record of oppression and cruelty. Your barbarities brought on the Herero and Hottentot rebellions, and your war upon them was turned into a ruthless massacre of man, woman, and child. During those 25 years you reduced the Hereros from about 80,000 to 15,000, the Hottentots from about 20,000 to 9,800, and the Berg-Damaras from about 30,000 to 12,800.

Well may you be envious, for while your "most hated enemy" is loved and defended in her every possession, you are hated and feared, and were it left for your colonies to determine whether they should remain under your control, nothing short of that cunning and bribery which gave you your success in Russia could save them to you.

You say, "Envy induced our enemies to fight, and war came upon us." Your preparation for 40 years belies your utterance. Your military writers proclaim its falsity. Every written instrument, every diplomatic utterance of every European nation which has been drawn into the vortex of this awful conflagration, spells the word "lie" across that declaration.

Austria, under your guidance and influence, using the murder of the Archduke Frederic as a pretext, prepared for the conquest of Serbia. She imposed terms upon that little country which no self-respecting nation could accept. She not only imposed terms of severe abasement but demanded the surrender of Serbian sovereignty itself. Through the pressure of Great Britain, in an effort to prevent this war, Serbia agreed to all the terms imposed by the Austrian note, with the exception of the surrender of her sovereignty to Austria. Sir Edward Grey then appealed to Austria not to insist upon the destruction of Serbian sovereignty. He appealed to Russia, the guardian of this helpless Balkan State, to assure Austria that Russia would not interfere if Serbian independence were not threatened. He appealed to France and to Germany. Russia gave the assurance, France acquiesced. He begged and pleaded with all to avert this threatened world war. The Austrian attitude was gradually being softened, and, except for the German war lord and the German war party, who claimed to withhold their advice to their ally but who secretly encouraged her and insisted that she should not yield, the efforts of the British premier would have been successful. Upon the refusal of Germany to do anything to prevent this war, Sir Edward Grey appealed for arbitration, asking Germany herself to be one of the arbitrators. France agreed, Russia consented. But the power that had prepared for and was engineering this war was obdurate. He then pleaded for an extension of time in the Austrian ultimatum, pleaded for just a few days, that he might influence the peace-loving instinct of the nations of the world to avert this war. All his pleas were treated with arrogant disdain.

Germany knew that Russia could not and would not allow Austria to subjugate Serbia. She knew a treaty existed between Russia and France similar to that between herself and Austria; that an attack by more than one great nation would bring to the one so attacked the support of her ally.

Failing to check Austrian aggression toward Serbia, Sir Edward Grey, realizing what fate held in store for humanity in the event of a world war, sought to confine the impending conflict to Russia and Austria, holding out the assurance that if Germany would abstain from the conflict France would do likewise. Again these peace endeavors by the British premier were spurned. But still undaunted, Sir Edward Grey pressed to limit the sphere of this conflict. The German ambassador was directed to ascertain the British attitude in case of war—what would be the attitude of England if Germany and Austria made war on France and Russia. There could be but little question in the German mind as to the final outcome of such a war.

Before replying to these queries as to British attitude, and seeking further to keep England out of the war if it were possible to do so, Sir Edward Grey put the question directly to the German Government: In case your armies are successful, what is your purpose toward French colonies; will you agree not to interfere with them? Answer: We will not. Will you agree to adhere to the treaty which you signed with us and other nations to respect the national and territorial sovereignty of Belgium? Answer: We will not promise.

The British ambassadors to Berlin and Vienna then made it clear that Great Britain must keep her treaty with Belgium, and gave them to understand that the invasion of Belgium or a threat to dispossess France of her colonies would compel Great Britain to come to their defense. But, unlike the German autocracy, the English people themselves must decide for war or peace, and they could speak only through their parliament.

Fearing that diplomacy might prevent war, the war lord dared not stay his purpose longer, and in the midst of the most earnest efforts of other nations to avoid this storm, he declared war, first on Russia, and then on France, and at the same instant began the invasion of Belgium.

And yet he talks about our "envious enemies" making war on Germany; that England, unprepared England, who, for three long years has been fighting this war with one hand while she has been preparing for war with the other, instigated this war against Germany. Was ever such a monstrous slander of nations and of truth—was ever such an ungodly falsehood fed to a people?

You might ask me, Why reiterate these first causes of war, with which we are all familiar? I answer: Because the terms which should be imposed must rest on the question of responsibility for this devastating conflict, on the question of who made this war; and I desire that we shall not lose sight of that responsibility now that the enemy bids for peace.

But you, the divinly consecrated war Emperor, say you wish peace. Your ally asks a conference. What an insult to our sense of honor and justice is this request for a conference! The burglar who has murdered our children and burned our home asks us to sit with him in friendly discussion of terms of peace. The nation that would accept an invitation to talk peace before this monster of arrogant militarism has been defeated and tethered blasphemes our sacred cause and dishonors our noble dead.

Yes; you can have peace to-day. Under what terms? First, the unconditional surrender of your armies; second, immediate restitution of countries occupied by you; third, reparation for your wrongs.

Restitution alone can never be accepted as a peace condition. Before another year has closed you will have no foreign territory to restore. Our armies will have restored those devastated countries to their rightful sovereignties and liberated their peoples whom you have enslaved.

If the entire cost of this war could be imposed on those who are directly responsible, we would unhesitatingly say that you should repay to the last dollar all the damages and injuries you have inflicted. But such a burden could not be borne by any single nation or by the central powers combined; and even if it could be borne, the German common people, who, as I have said, are not directly responsible for this war, would have to bear the onerous load of debt for at least 300 years.

We shall not be guided by what you would have done had you been victorious. We shall not put ourselves on the level with the robber and murderer. You have pillaged every province which you have overcome, taken every dollar in sight, levied enormous tribute, and enslaved the peoples.

But to the extent that reparation can be made, and within the clear rules of international law, we should demand and enforce reparation. What reparation, then, can and should be enforced under international law? You plotted for and caused this awful carnage. Because of your malicious purpose to dominate and subjugate the balance of the world, Serbia, Roumania, Belgium, a large portion of Russia, and a portion of France have been devastated. You should, therefore, be compelled to pay every dollar necessary to rebuild the devastated cities and villages, and make habitable and productive the once fertile fields. That is the first step toward reparation.

Under international law commerce-carrying vessels can be attacked only by a war vessel after being commanded to stop and submit to search, and then only in case of an attempt to escape. And no ship can be sunk without first having the safety of passengers and crew provided for, and even then only in case such ship is clearly proved to be carrying contraband of war to a belligerent whose shores have effectively been blockaded.

Your entire submarine warfare, so far as it has been directed against merchant ships, has been piratical, brutal, and contrary to international law. Therefore, you should pay the value of every ship and cargo so illegally destroyed.

Again, more than 40 years ago you made successful war on unprepared France. You robbed her of two of her fairest Provinces, and, not content with that, you forced her to pay you a billion dollars of tribute. Anything short of the return of these Provinces and the repayment of this forced tribute with interest would be playing with justice.

I am not so certain that we should not go back farther and compel a restitution of the Provinces taken by force from Denmark in 1864 and from Austria in 1866. But if time has healed the lacerations caused by those wars and conquests, we may also forget.

Nor should we stop here. Contrary to international law and every law of humanity, your officers have murdered and ordered murdered helpless military and civil prisoners. I need here but cite the case of the submarine captain who first compelled his prisoners to throw into the sea their life preservers, then placed them on the outer deck, submerged his vessel, and left those prisoners to die a strangling death in the waves; the murder of Capt. Fryatt because he dared to offer resistance to this slimy monster of the undersea; the murder of the nurse, Edith Cavell, whose tender hands had ministered to the needs of suffering and wounded German and English soldiers alike, because she did not attempt to prevent the escape of English wounded prisoners from brutal captors; the torturing to death of sick prisoners because of their inability to bear the cross of labor imposed upon them; the murder and maiming of civilian men, women, and children. None of these are acts of war. They all fall into the category of malicious murder and should be dealt with as such. They are outrageous breaches of international comity, and no unwhipped nation can do less than demand the trial and execution of the monsters who perpetrated them and the payment of punitive damages.

If you want peace, therefore, say to the world which you have outraged, to the nations you have attempted by this inexcusable war to destroy and enslave: We now renounce our hypocrisy; we admit our criminal purpose in inaugurating this war and our criminal acts in attempting to effectuate those purposes. We will restore every foot of foreign territory occupied by us. We will pay the cost of restoring the cities, villages, and farms we have devastated. We will return to France Alsace and Lorraine, and repay the war indemnity we exacted from her in 1870. We will pay for every ship and cargo sunk by our submarines contrary to the law of nations and humanity. We will surrender for trial those who have willfully murdered prisoners and civilians, and will meet such indemnity charges as justice will warrant. We will leave the question of the return of our colonies, the right to which we have forfeited by our own acts, to the judgment of the great nations of the world, governed and influenced by the desire of the people of the colonies themselves.

And, finally, we will agree to such a system of disarmament as will insure our future good behavior, and sign with other nations a solemn compact that will assure every nation, great and small, its territorial and sovereign rights.

Do and say these things, and Germany will be spared that awful spectacle of devastating warfare which other nations have suffered because of the crimes of her aristocratic and autocratic militarism.

You boasted the day, and you toasted the day,
And now the day has come.
Blasphemer, braggart, and coward all,
Little you reck of the numbing ball,
The blasting shell, or the white arm's fall,
As they speed poor humans home.

You spied for the day, you lied for the day,
And worked for the day's red spleen.
Monster, who asked God's aid divine,
Then strewed His seas with ghastly wine,
Not all the waters of the Rhine
Can wash thy foul hands clean.

You dreamed for the day, you schemed for the day,
Watch how the day will go.
Slayer of age, and youth, and prime (Defenseless slain for never a crime),
Thou art steeped in blood as a hog in slime,
False friend and cowardly foe.

You have sown for the day, you have grown for the day,
Yours is the harvest red.
Can you hear the groans and the awful cries?
Can you see the heap of slain that lies,
And sightless, turned to the flame-split skies,
The glassy eyes of the dead?

You have wronged for the day, you have longed for the day,
That lit the awful flame.
'Tis nothing to you that hill and plain
Yield sheaves of dead amid the grain;
That widows mourn for their loved ones slain,
And mothers curse thy name.

But after the day there's a price to pay
For the sleepers under the sod,
And He you have mocked for many a day—
Listen and hear what He has to say:
"Vengeance is mine, I will repay."
What can you say to God?

As he best serves God who serves his fellow man, so this debt you owe to God can only be paid by making amends, so far as is in your power, for the great wrongs you have inflicted upon His people. When with truly contrite heart you cry your readiness to meet each and every one of these just demands it will be time to talk of peace. Until then there can be but one answer to your plea—let the war go on.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—W. H. H. HART.

Mr. SMOOT. Some time ago I presented to the Senate certain papers of W. H. H. Hart. They were referred to the Committee on Printing, with a view of having them printed as a public document. I now ask the privilege to withdraw those papers from the files of the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the request is granted.

SELECTIVE DRAFT.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a brief statement by Elihu Root with reference to the work of Gen. Crowder in connection with the draft.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Extract from opening address of Hon. Elihu Root at conference of State and local bar association delegates, Cleveland, Ohio, Aug. 27, 1918.]

The bar has answered to the demands which these amazing issues present. It was a fortunate circumstance that the President placed in the hands of the head of the law department of the Army the application of the law for conscription and for the raising of the vast Army already in France, and the still greater Army which is about to follow; for, in the first place, the Judge Advocate General, Gen. Crowder, when he became Provost Marshal General, applied the new law under the war power of the Constitution to the people of the country with a just sense of their legal rights and the legal principles to which they were accustomed. I do not want to pass his name without expressing a sense of satisfaction and doing honor to that admirable and able and effective officer, Gen. Crowder. [Applause.] We have had much criticism; many things have necessarily gone wrong, many things have made us unhappy, but we could always turn to him and to his work as proof that virtue still remained in the American people. [Applause.] Whatever has gone wrong it has not gone wrong with him, and the result of his work is a million and a half of American soldiers in France to-day and a million and more that are yet to go. [Applause.] Gen. Crowder, as I say, applied the new law under war powers to the American people with a just sense of their legal rights. To accomplish that he called upon the bar, and the bar of America has responded most nobly by the thousands and tens of thousands and have given their services and their devotion to the work which underlies all American service in France. The law offices of the country have been emptied not merely of the noble and generous youths who have gone across the water, but of their elders who have laid aside lucrative business and have given their time and their strength, some of them to the extreme limit, to the application of this law of conscription to the American people. The result is that the draft has taken its place throughout America with the good will and the satisfaction and the undiminished patriotism and the enthusiasm of the entire people, and the boys who have been drafted and have gone into the National Army are as full of patriotism as any man that ever marched in any army. [Applause.]

Gen. Crowder was to have been here to-day. Unfortunately, the paramount duties imposed upon him by the condition in which the new draft law is forbade him to come. That law is imminent; the committees are at work upon it now, and it is about to be reported. That law extends the ages of conscription to 18 and 45. It is a law which is necessary to enable us to do actually our great part. So Gen. Crowder must stay in Washington at his post of duty; we could not ask him to come here, though we greatly regret his absence. In Gen. Crowder's absence, Mr. Lowell and Mr. Boston, both of them very familiar with the work which the bar has been doing, will speak to the conference and explain that work in detail.

LIBERTY BONDS.

Mr. SIMMONS. From the Committee on Finance I report back favorably, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 12923) to supplement the second liberty-bond act, as amended, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 571) thereon.

I desire to say that it was my purpose to call up this bill for consideration this afternoon, but I learn that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] has to leave the city; and if I should do so it would interfere with his desire to submit some remarks. Therefore I shall not call up the bill this afternoon, but give notice that to-morrow morning, as soon as the routine business is over, I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of this bill.

THE REVENUE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, we are nearing the time when the Senate, for the purposes of the national security and defense and to insure the vigorous prosecution of the war, will have under consideration a new war-revenue bill.

The bill as reported by the House Ways and Means Committee is now and has for several days been under discussion in that body.

The bill imposes a great task upon the Members of the two Houses to know thoroughly the contents of the bill, including the subjects and methods of taxation proposed therein.

A yet greater task will be imposed on the American people.

It is conceded on all sides that whatever criticism there may be of the methods of taxation as proposed in the bill, or however such methods may be modified before the bill becomes law, it will, as it is finally passed and approved, provide for the raising by taxation of the enormous sum of $8,000,000,000 in a single year, or more than double the amount raised under the law of October, 1917.

The nearly $4,000,000,000 collected under that act exceeded the estimated amount by nearly $1,500,000,000.

If the act which we are soon to consider yields proportionally larger returns, the Government will receive therefrom, instead of $8,000,000,000, more than $12,000,000,000, or more than one-half the estimated expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

If we succeed in this, it will be a marvelous achievement—such a one as so recently as two years ago, or even within less time than that, we would have hardly thought possible. Aside from liberty loan and Red Cross subscriptions, it will be the splendid evidence of both the material resources of the Nation and the patriotism of the American people.

I can not but pause to consider for a moment the unanimity with which we will agree to impose on the taxpayers of the land this estimated burden of $8,000,000,000, whatever the exact process or method adopted for portions of the tax.

In this respect there will be no political party division. I am confident that on this side of the Chamber there will be that unanimity which thus far has characterized Republican support of every measure meant for the vigorous prosecution of the war. In regard to the attitude of Republicans toward such measures it is surplusage to say that "politics is adjourned." There never has been any politics. The country will not fail to recognize the part the counsels and opinions of the minority have played, whether expressed in speech or in vote, in helping along, in stemming the tide of German propaganda, in arousing and unifying the national spirit, in hastening the work of preparation, too long delayed, and in insisting first of all on the complete victory that will insure a just and lasting peace. In this we stand united behind the declaration of the President of the United States. But without raising any party issue, without a word in derogation of the record and achievements of a Democratic administration, the Republican Party, from its beginning until now, has been preeminently the party with a national vision; naturally and I may say necessarily so. The wrongs, real and threatened, which gave the party birth; the struggle for a free and reunited Nation which it carried on to victory; the settlement of a thousand questions growing out of the Civil War; the intervention later which brought freedom and civilization to the many millions of our now insular possessions show alike the broad national spirit which has animated it and its capacity to govern. In supporting now with earnestness and enthusiasm a new tax bill for the national safety and defense, the Republican Party is but acting in accordance with its own national ideals and traditions.

But, Mr. President, to recur briefly to the bill and to its predecessor, the act of October, 1917:

There has been, if there is not now, in certain quarters a gross misconception as to the sanction or want of sanction under which the latter bill was considered and passed. For example, it has been represented by insinuation and inuendo, if not in direct terms, that the President, while he signed the bill, had manifested his disapproval of the rates of taxation imposed on incomes and excess profits on the ground that such rates were not sufficiently high. The Secretary of the Treasury is also involved, and the impression sought to be conveyed is that he likewise had advocated a higher rate. But who on this floor during the many weeks of earnest debate of these two main features of the bill, the income and excess-profits tax, ever heard a suggestion that the White House or the Treasury was of the opinion the rates for either were too low? What Senator who voted for any of the amendments to increase rates which were rejected received any hint that his support of such amendments would be agreeable to the administration? Not one.

And I venture the assertion, Mr. President, that not a member of the great Finance Committee of the Senate from its distinguished chairman down to the last appointee on that committee was ever informed, directly or indirectly, that the rates agreed to by the committee, either in session or on the floor of the Senate, were not as high as the administration thought justifiable under the then existing conditions.

Mr. President, of the same piece and of the same character exactly is the statement persisted in that Senators and Representatives are exempt from the income and excess-profits tax under the law of 1917.

Some months ago I had the honor in an address to the people of South Dakota to make the following statement:

> There being some doubt whether, under the new revenue act, Senators and Representatives were exempt from the excess-profits tax, on the 17th day of December last I introduced an amendment to the act providing that it should not be construed so as to exempt Senators and Representatives from such tax. It has since been ruled by the Treasury Department that they are not exempt.

There are Senators here who will remember the introduction of the amendment referred to in that address and the suggestion made by the chairman of the Finance Committee at the time that there was some doubt as to whether, under the language of the act of 1917, Senators and Representatives were not exempt, but the chairman thought it probable that the Treasury Department would rule that they were not exempt. And the ruling was long ago made that they are not exempt. There is absolutely, Mr. President, no excuse whatever at this late day for assertions or intimations of this kind.

But, recurring to rates, I do not mention this want of administration sanction of higher rates in the law of 1917 as a matter of great importance in itself. It is not nor should it be so regarded in determining the votes of Senators. While we may respect the Executive will and judgment, it is not supposed that the legislative judgment and conscience are subordinate thereto. Nor do I mention it in defense of the law. I think it needs none from the standpoint of rates.

I mention it because of the baseless assumption that the administration itself desired the rates should be higher and because of the political prejudices sought to be created thereby. Resort is had to the address of the President to the joint assembly of the two Houses May 27 last as ground for these false representations of the President's attitude in September, 1917. But when the President said in that address that the present tax laws were marred by inequities which ought to be remedied, he was not understood as intimating that the higher rates on either excess profits or incomes as provided by the law of 1917 were not high enough, but rather that there were inequities between the lower and the higher rates which should be remedied—a proposition to which we all might agree. But these are inequities which the administration of the law rather than the passage of the law has disclosed.

When the President said in his May address that there was much profiteering, and that the profiteering which can not be got at by the restraints of conscience and the love of country can be got at by taxation, he suggested to my mind a doubtful remedy, at least an incomplete remedy. For this question has a double aspect—the Government, as such, on the one hand, and the consuming public on the other. The extra tax imposed by the Government against the profiteer does not relieve the victims of the profiteer, who themselves pay the prices which yield the profits out of which the tax is paid, unless, indeed, the profiteer is taxed to death. There is much loose thinking and more loose talking about the profiteer. Large profits and profiteering are not synonymous. If they were, the farmer, the live-stock grower, the cotton grower, the gardener, and the dairyman would come under the condemnation implied in the word "profiteer." And likewise would many corporations whose situation or facilities enable them to produce at low cost and to sell at a fair margin of profit, but for whose product there is that extraordinary and continuous demand which insures in the aggregate a large profit. But none of these are profiteers, at least in that opprobrious sense in which we use that term nowadays.

The real profiteer, the man or the corporation who refuses a fair price and holds and hoards against a time of stress when he sells at an inordinate price; the workman getting a fair wage in building ships who uses the "strike" weapon in time of the Government's direst need to compel payment of more than a fair wage; the munitions manufacturer who is oblivious to the cause for which the allies fight, who sees his prosperity in their necessities, and remorselessly takes advantage of the same in the egregious price he demands for his product—these all are profiteers. They are the men who are not restrained by conscience or by love of country. You can not so distinguish and classify as to remedy the evil and extortions for which they are responsible by a general revenue bill. Something more speedy, certain, and drastic is needed.

I think many of them might be summarily dealt with under laws now in force. If not, let us pass another law for the purpose of the national security and defense, and in the interests of justice and humanity as well.

A word further as to the $8,000,000,000 revenue bill now pending in the House. Some time ago in referring to some profits taxes were not high enough I said:

> I shall support any necessary increase in both income and excess-profits taxes and in doing so shall be governed by the principle that the big incomes and big profits should bear the largest part of the burden.

The need is evident. We have lived in anticipation of it. There may be radical differences of opinion as to methods and rates, but an act will be passed under which that amount will be raised.

Our chief concern must be in seeing that the burden is justly and equitably distributed and that in fixing rates we make "ability to pay" our guiding principle.

I am not sure that this principle has been followed in the proposed income-tax rates.

The bill does not deal as justly with the smaller incomes as does the law of 1917.

The normal tax is increased to 12 per cent, except that for the first $4,000 of net income the rate shall be 6 per cent. Waiving the question as to whether the limitation of 6 per cent should not be applied to larger incomes than $4,000, say $5,000 or $6,000, the surtax rates are unjustly and, I think, unnecessarily high on the smaller incomes. If rates were properly apportioned to increased incomes with the principle of "ability to pay" kept steadily in mind as we approach the larger incomes, more revenue would be derived than under the schedule proposed by the bill. The income of $4,000 of a married person being allowed a deduction of $2,000 and subject to a normal tax of 6 per cent only will pay a tax of $120 under the proposed law. The income of $5,000 will, with like deduction, pay a tax of $180. There is not much objection to the successive increases in rates on incomes from $4,000 up to $10,000, where the whole tax is $845. But the tax on $12,500 is $1,320, which makes a tax of $475 on an additional income of $2,500, or 19 per cent. Then thousand dollars is not a large income, by any means, and the addition of $2,500 thereto should not be subjected to that much of a burden. It is at least not proportionate to the additional surtax imposed on large increases to large incomes. Take another illustration among the ordinary incomes: The income of $20,000 will pay under the proposed bill $2,895, the income of $25,000 will pay $4,245, which means a tax of 27 per cent on the additional $5,000.

But now turning to the surtaxes as applied to the larger incomes: On the $50,000 difference between $150,000 and $100,000 the rate is 50 per cent, and that is an increase of but 2 per cent over the rate in the last bracket of $90,000 to $100,000. For the income in excess of $150,000 and not exceeding $200,000 exactly the same rate per cent of surtax is paid as on the income between $100,000 and $150,000.

Compare this with the case of the man who manages, by hard work and close attention to business, to increase his income from $10,000 to $15,000. He is required to pay 7 per cent, or $350 on the increase; and the man fortunate enough to increase his income from $30,000 to $40,000 may pay $2,000 in surtaxes for the privilege.

The inequity is the more apparent as we go up the scale.

The income of $300,000 pays no higher rate than the income of $200,000; the income of $500,000 no higher rate than the income of $300,000; the income of one million no more than the income of $500,000; the income of five millions no higher rate than the income of one million. All pay a normal tax at the same rate, of course. Under it men are taxed in proportion to the amounts of their fortunes, but this is not the test of ability to pay. The surtax is adaptable to the progressive increases in income, and it should be made commensurate with ability to pay as disclosed by successive increases. It will require finer gradations of these incomes and probably increased rates for the larger incomes over those prescribed in the bill, but I am sure it will be in the interest of justice and an equitable distribution of the burden.

The bill provides for a war-profits tax and an excess-profits tax method; the assessment against any corporation to be made under the method which will produce the greater amount of revenue.

The suggestion revives the discussion of a year ago. In view of that and of the prewar incomes of various corporations as compared with their incomes subsequent to 1913 the objection of the Secretary of the Treasury to any increase in excess-profits taxes came as a surprise, not that the discussion showed there should be an increase over the rates provided in that bill, but because of the new and extraordinary demand that we raise this year $8,000,000,000 instead of $2,535,000,000, as estimated under the law of 1917. This means an increase in rates all along the line. Excess profits should take their due share. I mean here excess profits as distinguished from war profits. Last year the only method was the excess-profits tax. The impression seemed to be that it must be either the one or the other, and in that view Congress wisely adopted the excess-profits plan in order that the corporations with large prewar profits, but with such profits not enhanced by reason of the war, might bear their just proportion of the public burden. Had we adopted the war-profits method with an 80 per cent rate even, after allowing credits according to the pending bill one corporation of the United States would have paid in war-profits tax $175,118, but the same corporation paid in excess-profits tax under the 1917 law the sum of $715,924.

Another great corporation would have paid no war-profits tax at all, but as excess-profits tax it paid the handsome sum of $3,452,884.

Still another corporation that would have gone scot free under the war-profits tax method paid under the act of last year the sum of $1,852,624 as an excess-profits tax.

Another concern not liable for war-profits taxes paid excess-profits taxes amounting to $275,618.

And there were others whose profits for 1917 were not in excess of the average annual prewar period profits and who, under a strictly war-profits plan of taxation, would have contributed little or nothing to the Federal Treasury. Hence the excess-profits method of 1917.

Granting, Mr. President, that corporations of this character are comparatively few, an excess-profits instead of a war-profits tax is the only way to reach them. In view of the increased need, as well as in justice to other taxpayers, one can hardly understand why the Secretary of the Treasury should oppose an increase in the excess-profits tax. The Secretary says in the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee that "the existing law should receive modification not from the point of view of producing additional revenue from the excess-profits tax, but from the point of view of producing the same revenue and with a reduced and not an increased injustice and inequality."

But there is nothing incompatible between high rates of taxation and justice and equality. I venture the suggestion that the tax might be increased so that corporations like those mentioned might pay their just proportion of a greatly increased general burden of taxation without any increased injustice and inequality. We ought to be able to frame a statute accordingly.

Mr. President, remembering what the act of 1917 has accomplished as a revenue producer; how the estimates as to what would be raised under it exceeded the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury as to the amount necessary to be raised by taxation, and how in turn the amount actually raised exceeded the former estimate by a billion and a half, there is reason for some satisfaction with the act, and reason for pride in the resources and material wealth which the administration of the act has disclosed, and pride, too, in the general ready response of those who own and control that wealth to the requirements of the law. In not going beyond the rates there imposed, or I may say in not going beyond the requirements of the Treasury, we saved and conserved for a time of greater need. We did not cripple or destroy the wealth or the industries which produce it, and, better than all, we saved the hope and spirit of the men whose investments and energies have done so much to rear the industrial fabric on whose stability and efficiency a Nation in arms must rely.

And the hour of greater need is here. To meet it the Secretary of the Treasury, while not approving an increase in the excess-profits tax, advises a war-profits tax of 80 per cent. We shall have both. And the Nation, with a keener perception of the mighty task we have undertaken, of the splendid mission we are to fulfill, will ungrudgingly respond to the call. For "what profiteth it a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" Of what solace will it be, what source of pride will it be, to have made ourselves the richest Nation in the world and yet to know that we had neglected our mission or failed in our task because we had forgotten our priceless heritage of American liberty and lost our interest in the liberties of the rest of mankind?

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, sometime ago when House joint resolution No. 200—Order of Business 123 on the calendar—was under consideration there was an understanding that before the joint resolution should be brought up again for consideration ample notice would be given in the open Senate so that absentees might be present. I therefore desire to give notice now that on Thursday of next week, at the conclusion of the morning business, I shall move to take up for consideration House joint resolution 200, which is the woman-suffrage amendment to the Constitution.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, September 18, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, September 17, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Come, Thou Almighty, Creator and Dispenser of all good, quicken our minds, that we may think clearly, act wisely, and thus become potent factors in restoring order and establishing peace in a distracted world; that the energy bestowed upon Thy children may be used for the promotion of good; that happiness and peace may rejoice every heart; and Thy will be done in Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague, Mr. KETTNER, be excused indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that his colleague, Mr. KETTNER, be given indefinite leave of absence on account of illness in his family. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Speaker, on September 11 I introduced a bill (H. R. 12919) granting an increase of pension to Ann E. McGrew, which was inadvertently referred to the Committee on Pensions. It being a Civil War case, I ask that it be referred to the Invalid Pensions Committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to change the reference. It is a private bill.

WAR SUPPLY OF CERTAIN ORES, METALS, AND MINERALS.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 11259) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported, or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply, may be taken from the Speaker's table, and that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is that the war minerals bill?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. May I inquire if the Senate have made very extensive changes in the bill?

Mr. FOSTER. They accomplish the same purpose in a roundabout way.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I have been advised that they struck out most of the minerals that were comprehended in the House bill.

Mr. FOSTER. No; the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. WALSH. It is all one amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. It is all one amendment. They have added one or two minerals, principally sodium. We had sea salt in the bill, and they struck that out and inserted sodium, which enlarges the scope of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Senate-bill plan of developing these minor minerals is entirely different from that set out in the House bill?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Senate bill does away with the guaranteed price for a certain number of years, which was objectionable to quite a number of Members of the House?

Mr. FOSTER. I know that is true.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The bill as it came from the Senate is quite a different bill in plan and scope, is it not, from the House bill?

Mr. FOSTER. It is quite different.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I do not want to delay the passage of the bill, because I think it is a good bill. Under ordinary conditions it would seem to me that it ought to go back to the Committee on Mines and Mining, but to do that would delay it.

Mr. FOSTER. That would delay it, and I think it is important that it be passed as soon as possible.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Of course the gentleman is aware that under this plan of procedure various details of the bill may never come up for consideration by the House.

Mr. FOSTER. As far as I am concerned, I shall try to give the House an opportunity for full consideration of the bill.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman give us an opportunity to discuss the various changes which are made?

Mr. FOSTER. I will.

Mr. GARNER. We ought to be willing to trust the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am entirely willing to do so.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to take this bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. FOSTER, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, and Mr. GARLAND.

REVENUE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the revenue bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 12863.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH), there were—ayes 101, noes 4.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman mean a quorum of the House or of the committee?

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. A quorum of the House.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum of the House.

Mr. KITCHIN. We will have a quorum in the committee.

The SPEAKER. The doorkeeper will lock the doors, the sergeant at arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I raise a point of order.

The SPEAKER. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. The gentleman's position is untimely.

The SPEAKER. That does not make any difference. In the House a man can do anything allowed by the rules, at the right time or at the wrong time. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 278, not voting 152, as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12863, to provide revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. My recollection is that when the committee rose last night there was pending a demand for tellers on an amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE]. Am I correct?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct. The Chair was going to state the parliamentary status. A call for tellers had been made and at that moment the point of no quorum was made. It was ascertained that there was no quorum present, and the committee rose. The question now is on the demand for tellers.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 1, after the word "State," strike out the word "Territory," and in line 2, after the word "thereof," strike out all down to and including "$5,000" in line 18, page 10.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the demand for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. MONTAGUE, and the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. CRISP.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported that there were 61 ayes and 132 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 21, after the word "possessions," strike out the last sentence of the clause, being the rest of the line, and all of lines 22, 23, and 24 on that page, and the first two lines of page 11.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, may I ask that the Clerk read the portion proposed to be stricken out and show what is left?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the case of obligations of the United States issued after September 1, 1917, the interest shall be exempt only if and to the extent provided in the act authorizing the issue thereof, and shall be excluded from gross income only if and to the extent it is wholly exempt from taxation both under this title and under Title III.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That is what is stricken out, and what is left is the exemption of the obligations of the United States or its possessions.

It is odd that, as the matter now stands and if the clause remain as it is now, interest on the obligations of the Philippines would be totally free from taxation when received as income. The obligations of any Territory would be totally free from taxation, because money received from the obligations of the United States and its possessions is excepted from the gross income, whereas there is only a restriction upon that exception with reference to the United States; but, Mr. Chairman, that is a matter which I suppose the chairman of the committee would change as to the bonds of the possessions of the United States. There is no reason why those should be better than the bonds of the United States. To come to my amendment, I ask the gentleman to consider what a muddle we are making of the grand old credit of the United States by saying that the bonds of the United States shall not be taxable in the hands of a man who holds $25,000 or $45,000 of them and shall be taxable in the hands of a man who holds more. If the man who holds a small amount wants to sell, he can not find a market, because the great man can not buy them. In old times the United States issued obligations bearing interest as high as 6 per cent, and we reduced the interest regularly to 5 and 4 and 3 and even 2 per cent, because the bonds represented the credit of the United States, absolutely free from taxation in the hands of the holder, and we could thus maintain that credit of the United States. Now we exempt income that comes from a 3½ per cent bond, and it is now at a premium. We may well believed we could put out a 3 per cent bond at a premium, as we used to do. The credit of the United States is good, but if the law says, as to the bonds of the United States, that if anyone holds them in large blocks he must pay a surtax upon them up to as high as 40 and 50 and 65 per cent, Congress will then have ruined the credit of the United States in the great markets of the world. That is not the way in which the Congress of the United States should deal with the credit of the United States.

The amendment of the gentlman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] was right. State credit should be preserved, so that the States could negotiate their securities at 5 and 6 per cent free of taxes, but the United States credit should be preserved also, so that our bonds may be negotiated, as they can be now, at 3½ per cent, and as they used to be at 3 and 2 per cent, for we are the greatest country in the world, with the greatest credit anywhere, and we have no right to play with that credit by making our bonds taxable at any time. I did not bring that question up the other day because it seemed to be a matter of agreement, but it has now come on this great revenue bill. If we want revenue, we must maintain credit; and the only way to maintain credit is to make the bonds of the United States unimpeachable in any hands or in any market. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to speak briefly concerning an important subject which came before the House yesterday during the argument made by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, Gov. MONTAGUE. While the gentleman from Virginia was contending against the constitutionality of the provision taxing the income from State and municipal bonds I came into the Chamber, after having been called out by a constituent, and interrupted the gentleman, but merely to suggest to him that Mr. Justice Cooley, in his works on the Constitution, declares that if a legislator be in doubt as to the constitutionality of a pending measure it is his duty to vote against it, and not, as men are accustomed to say, put it up to the court to decide. I said nothing more. Subsequently several gentlemen, in private conversation, doubted the accuracy of my reference to the statement of Mr. Justice Cooley. As I had not read the statement for a long time I decided to consult the book itself. This I did, and I now invite attention to page 172 of Cooley on Constitutional Law, and to the following:

"Legislators have their authority measured by the Constitution; they are chosen to do what it permits, and nothing more, and they take solemn oath to obey and support it. When they disregard its provisions they usurp authority, abuse their trust, and violate the promise they have confirmed by an oath. To pass an act when they are in doubt whether it does not violate the Constitution is to treat as of no force the most imperative obligations any person can assume. A business agent who would deal in that manner with his principal's business would be treated as untrustworthy; a witness in court who would treat his oath thus lightly and affirm things concerning which he was in doubt would be held a criminal. Indeed, it is because the legislature has applied the judgment of its members to the question of its authority to pass the proposed law and has only passed it after being satisfied of the authority that the judiciary waive their own doubts and give it their support."

It thus appears that I was correct in the reference which I made to the views of this distinguished jurist and authority on constitutional law as to the duty of legislators when confronted by questions of constitutionality.

I believe that if we examine carefully into our attitude toward measures we shall very often find that what we call our "doubts" are not real doubts at all. And I believe also that in the great majority of cases of so-called doubts on the question of constitutionality we can resolve them satisfactorily, at least to ourselves, by remembering and applying the rule laid down in a famous case by Chief Justice Marshall, a rule which lawyers know by heart and with which many of the laity are familiar.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. To test the constitutionality of a law, the great chief justice lays down this rule: Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but which consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.

Now, a few minutes ago I voted against the amendment of the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, proposing to strike out an important provision from the income-tax section of the pending bill, because, applying the famous rule thus established by the Supreme Court, speaking through Chief Justice Marshall, those provisions are, in my judgment, constitutional. I have time only for a mere suggestion of reasons. Certainly the end proposed is ligitimate and within the scope of the Constitution. It is to raise money necessary to enable our Government to carry on the war—to save, it may be, its life. The money is to be raised by taxation. Therefore the means proposed are appropriate and plainly adapted to that end. They are not prohibited, but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, because the taxes are to be levied impartially upon incomes from whatever source derived. Therefore, in my judgment, as I already have said, the provisions which by our last vote we kept in the bill are constitutional. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey would strike out the provision which was inserted in the income-tax law in accordance with the fixed policy established by the different bond-authorization acts with respect to the taxation of the interest and the principal of liberty bonds. Now, Congress, after full consideration, early decided against the policy of issuing tax-free bonds for the support of the war, but inserted in the various authorization acts provisions to the effect that those bonds should be exempt, both principal and interest, as to all taxes except income and excess-profits tax, on the interest and inheritance tax, on either principal or interest, or both. Now, this provision was simply inserted here in conformity with the authorization acts which had heretofore been passed by Congress in connection with the issuance of the different series of liberty-bond loans. I think the committee and the House do not desire now to reconsider in this manner, at least, and to reverse the entire policy which was originally adopted and has consistently and without material difference of opinion been pursued until this time. I think it is not worth while, therefore, to repeat the numerous arguments, the sound arguments, as I conceive them and as Congress has conceived them, in opposition to a policy of issuing tax-exemption liberty bonds to the enormous extent they must be issued for the successful and complete prosecution of the war. I hope, therefore, and I feel that, without entering into a discussion or a repetition of those well-known and well-understood reasons, the committee will be disposed to vote down the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 1, after the letter "(a)," insert "obligations of a State, Territory, or any political subdivision thereof, or the District of Columbia, in the same amount and conditions as liberty bonds up to and including the same rate of interest as the liberty bonds."

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, when this legislation was proposed to this House it provided that State, county, and city bonds receive just the same treatment as liberty bonds were to receive; that they should have to pay the same taxes and should receive the same exemption. This legislation that has been brought in here and passed at the suggestion of this committee or the Secretary of the Treasury, by which a much larger amount of liberty bonds is exempted, has changed that situation. You now have a very considerable exemption of a good many thousands of dollars of liberty bonds, but not such exemption for the bonds of a city, State, and county. Now, if it was right when this bill was brought in to extend the same exemptions to both of them, and the same taxation, that principle is still correct, and I am of the opinion that that is the fact, and for that reason this amendment is offered.

Furthermore, you have previously felt that you had no authority to tax these bonds at all. Here, suddenly, you not only revolutionize your theory of what is constitutional taxation on the securities of sovereign States but you actually discriminate against their bonds in favor of your own. If you can really do this, you can make it impossible for city, State, or county to sell bonds at all and force the people to buy yours. Congress did that in the matter of State-bank notes, but you had a different constitutional provision. Perhaps you may make an equal tax stick, but the courts will probably hold your tax discriminating against the State bonds is unconstitutional. They should. You are taking a leap in the dark, anyway. Unless you accept my amendment you are simply trying to break your neck.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. I will.

Mr. BLACK. It occurs to me the gentleman's amendment would lessen and make smaller the exemption——

Mr. LITTLE. Not if the gentleman has read the context.

Mr. BLACK. This section absolutely exempts all of the bonds that have been heretofore issued from tax——

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Now, it seems to me, if he writes in the limitation which his amendment suggests he would limit it only to the extent——

Mr. LITTLE. No; the exemption for the bonds already issued will remain just the same, but all bonds, either city, State, or county, issued before or hereafter, will now, if my motion prevails, be given the same exemption as liberty bonds are given.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. I will.

Mr. HASTINGS. Has the gentleman given consideration to the question of offering his amendment to the proviso found further in this paragraph?

Mr. LITTLE. I have read that quite carefully.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does not the gentleman think his amendment had better come by striking out "$5,000," in line 18, page 10, and inserting his language or similar language?

Mr. LITTLE. I had considered at one time the placing of it there, but after a careful consideration I have decided this is the best place for it, and I think the gentleman from Oklahoma would think so if he would study it a little more.

The city bonds, for example, of course, are not supposed to have as good security as Federal Government bonds, and therefore the national bonds can sell at lower rates of interest than city bonds. Now, if you put a tax upon city bonds which is not put upon Federal bonds, you are really reducing the rate of interest on the city, State, and county bonds compared to that the Federal Government investment pays. In other words, the city will be compelled to raise the bond rate of interest if it is going to compete with Government bonds thus exempted. They have got to maintain these different State, city, and county governments and they have got to run them, and those gentlemen on this committee had that in mind when they made arrangements for similar exemption when this bill came in, but this sudden change in this new legislation (this other bill now passed since we began to consider this) exempting a good many thousand dollars' worth of these liberty bonds is a change that demands a change here, gentlemen, and that is what this provision gives. It simply says you shall exempt just as many thousand dollars' worth of city bonds as you do of liberty bonds, so they may continue to sell as before. In order to make it exactly the same, I have stated in my amendment you not only do that, but you shall not exempt the income on city bonds over and above the amount of interest the liberty bonds pay. This will bring an equality of taxable income and equality of taxable amount of principal. The two classes of bonds will maintain themselves as before on the market. If two men invest, the one in $10,000 of liberty bonds and the other in $10,000 of State bonds, they will pay exactly the same tax, and there will be no favoritism shown by this Government.

If, for example, a liberty bond would draw 4 per cent and a city bond 5, I only ask you to exempt the city-bond income up to 4 per cent, just the same as the liberty bond, and the other per cent they can pay upon. So they are in the same relation to taxation as if they had the same rate of interest as the liberty bond. Why should we interfere to favor one investment and injure another? I can not see how anybody can concede that the bill was properly drawn in the first place when they gave the liberty bond and municipal bond the same exemption, and then say that my amendment is not correct. Unless my amendment is just, and right, and equitable, and proper, then this bill was badly drawn in the first place. If these two sets of bonds are to be placed on the market alike, if they are to sell side by side, you have got to start them off even. You can not expect one horse to carry the big weight in this race to sell. We must legislate to give justice to all branches of this Government. We have got to take care of these municipalities. They can not stop operating every time we go to war. He is a mighty near-sighted statesman who does not consider this fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LITTLE. We must take care of the cities, States, and counties. We have got to see to it that the bonds they sell do not disorganize the market and are not disorganized on the market. You put a liberty bond on the market and it goes, for example, at 4 per cent, and it has no tax, and a city bond pays, say, 5 per cent with a tax. You are not going to sell those bonds, the city bonds, the State bonds, and the county bonds, at all. They will have to readjust the whole system that they have in order to raise the rate of interest upon every county, city, and State bond. If the market would go on without disorganization under that bill as originally drawn, with the same tax, it will not go that way if you differentiate between them. This is a matter of considerable importance, of great importance, to many communities, to all communities, and all I am asking is to restore this bill to the original plan and purpose by allowing municipal bonds and liberty bonds to go on the market in exactly the same condition; and if they do not, the market will be disorganized and you will have a great deal of trouble. What is the sense in making all this trouble when the courts may complicate the bond sales still further by deciding you are without authority to legislate to this purpose? The committee must enjoy adventure on an unknown sea to both invent a new system of taxation and use it to club the cities, counties, and States out of the bond market, all at one fell swoop, as our friend Macduff would say. Why involve your new-found authority, if you have any, in the complications that will arise when the court passes on your right to say the cities, counties, and States can not sell bonds if the Nation desires to? Gentlemen, it is hardly possible the Federal Government has the power to monopolize the bond market and stop cities, counties, and States from borrowing money.

Mr. HASTINGS. In line 18, if you would reform your amendment and strike out "$5,000" and insert "$30,000," it would accomplish that purpose.

Mr. LITTLE. After carefully studying the question I thought this was the place it should go.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would also suggest to the gentleman from Kansas and the gentleman from Oklahoma that that would not accomplish the purpose, because the $30,000 exemption only lasts until a year after the war, while the $5,000 would last forever.

Mr. LITTLE. That is a reason I had in mind in deciding as to the proper location for the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. LITTLE. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 11, noes 41.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 10, line 24, after the word "thereof" and before the comma, insert the following: "as amended and supplemented."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I have no argument to make.

Mr. KITCHIN. The committee is willing to adopt that amendment. It ought to be in.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey: Page 10, line 21, after the words "United States," strike out "or its possessions."

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I merely submit this to the gentleman in charge of the bill. You seem to have provided for the District of Columbia and for the Territories and subdivisions thereof as to prior debts only, and this makes absolute exemption of all obligations of our possessions, which I do not think was intended.

Mr KITCHIN. Under the existing law they have the same plan. Take the Philippines and Porto Rico, and they can have such tax law as their local legislatures prescribe. "Territory" is specified in the beginning of that page.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Does the committee desire to exempt what they have issued and shall issue thereafter without any limitation?

Mr. KITCHIN. So far as a "possession" is concerned, they can control. All the money that goes over goes to their treasury.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Their treasury issues bonds and some of our citizens hold those bonds, and this provides that our citizens shall be free from income tax on anything they receive from those bonds.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman that they have always been.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I do not ask for a vote, if it is so intended by the committee, although I do not agree.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word and request the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. Farm loans are included here amongst those exempted from taxation. I ask the gentleman if that provision was not made at the instance of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. KITCHIN. Interest from farm-loan bonds is exempt from tax under existing law and the proposed bill. The committee conferred with the Secretary of the Treasury in respect to striking out this exemption from the provision and making such interest subject to the tax, but the Secretary of the Treasury, after considerable consideration, advised the committee by letter that it would be very unwise to do that, and the committee concurred in the opinion of the Secretary.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman confirms my recollection that, although an effort was made to tax them, the farm loans were exempted at the instance of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. KITCHIN. I append herewith the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury that I refer to above:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, August 20, 1918.

Hon. CLAUDE KITCHIN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. KITCHIN: I have your letter of August 9 asking my views with reference to a proposal to amend the Federal farm-loan act of July 17, 1916, so that any bonds hereafter issued under such act shall be issued at the same rate and subject to the same taxation as bonds issued under the second liberty loan act as amended by the third liberty loan act.

The credit of the Federal land banks is high, but does not equal that of the United States Government, nor is it possible for Federal land banks to make an appeal to the patriotism of the people which the United States Government makes in offering its liberty bonds.

I have no hesitation in saying that the bonds issued under the farm-loan act could not be issued at the same rate and subject to the same taxation as bonds issued under the second liberty loan act, as amended by the third liberty loan act.

Whether bonds could be issued bearing interest at a higher rate, but subject to the same taxation as liberty bonds, I do not know. If the Congress should direct such an experiment, it would be necessary to authorize the Treasury, during the period of the war, to buy and hold such bonds as can not be sold, so that the functions of this great farm-loan system shall not be crippled at a time when farm production is of major importance. I do not undertake at this time to express an opinion as to the bonds of the joint-stock land banks which stand on a different footing.

Cordially, yours, W. G. MCADOO.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to withdraw this amendment. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(8) So much of the amount received by a person in the military or naval forces of the United States as salary or compensation in any form from the United States for services abroad or at sea in such forces as does not exceed $3,500.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, a gentleman who is now necessarily absent from the floor wishes to return to this at a later time. I ask unanimous consent that we may return to that later on.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the paragraph indicated may be returned to later, at the pleasure of the committee. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(c) In the case of nonresident alien individuals, gross income includes only the gross income from sources within the United States, including interest on bonds, notes, or other interest-bearing obligations of residents, corporate or otherwise, and including dividends from resident corporations.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Is it intended to tax interest on Government bonds received by people abroad—banks in Holland, or whoever might take them? Do the words "gross income from sources within the United States, including interest on bonds, notes, or other interest-bearing obligations of residents," and so forth, include interest on United States bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. To just the extent that the act taxes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It taxes them just as at home?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Does the gentleman think that there is likely to be much market for United States bonds abroad if everybody who buys them there has to pay surtaxes and all that sort of thing?

Mr. KITCHIN. He has to pay them over there.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. We have always tried to maintain the credit of the United States all over the world. It seems to me this is the best way to destroy it. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey withdraws his pro forma amendment. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(2) All interest paid or accrued within the taxable year on indebtedness (or, in the case of a nonresident alien individual, the proportion of such interest paid which the amount of his gross income from sources within the United States bears to the amount of his gross income from all sources within and without the United States) in excess of interest received free from taxation under this title.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, the committee offers an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 13, line 8, strike out the parenthesis and insert a comma. Line 12, strike out the parenthesis and all of line 12 after the parenthesis and all of line 13 through the word "title."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. May we have it read as amended?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read it as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

So that it will read as follows:

"All interest paid or accrued within the taxable year on indebtedness or, in the case of a nonresident alien individual, the proportion of such interest paid which the amount of his gross income from sources within the United States bears to the amount of his gross income from all sources within and without the United States."

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. PLATT. That is a matter that the New York Times called attention to in an editorial yesterday, is it not?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have not seen the New York Times.

Mr. PLATT. This taxes interest which you had previously tried to exempt. It puts it right back in again. You are striking out lines 12 and 13 because they make subject to taxation what you had previously tried to make free?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. I will say that is a suggestion of the Treasury Department which the committee has considered very carefully, and thinks it is a mistake and thinks it ought to be stricken out.

Mr. PLATT. I think it is right.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. LONDON. Yesterday during the discussion of the revenue bill and a few minutes before adjournment I made the statement that I was the only Representative of the State of New York on the floor at the time, and Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD, who represents a New York district, suggested that he was present.

I do not want to do any injustice to any other Member of Congress from the State of New York. The mere fact that at that particular moment Mr. FAIRCHILD and myself were the only ones from the city of New York who were on the floor does not indicate that the others were not in Washington or on the floor during some part of the day. So, for instance, Mr. CLEARY, Mr. CHANDLER, and Mr. DONOVAN have been very regular in their attendance. I have always seen them here on the floor. Mr. SMITH and Mr. RIORDAN were here yesterday during the day, and they are here to-day. I have been receiving fair play at the hands of every Member of this House, and I want to be fair to every Member of the House.

I just wanted to make this statement so that no more ill feeling should be aroused than is absolutely necessary. It is to be regretted that a good many Members find it necessary, or are compelled by attendance to departmental work on behalf of various constituents, to absent themselves from the floor. It is to be regretted that during the discussion of this revenue bill, involving the unprecedented burden of $8,000,000,000, only 278 Members have responded this morning to the call of the House. I thought it was my duty to make this statement, so that those who are regular in their attendance upon their duties in the House should not be injured by me.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LONDON. I do.

Mr. CANNON. I think the gentleman claimed yesterday, on the amendment that we voted on this morning, that he was the only New York Member now that complied with the request of the mayor of New York.

Mr. LONDON. Oh, the mentioning of the mayor was incidental.

Mr. CANNON. I know.

Mr. LONDON. I voted against the amendment, by the way.

Mr. CANNON. In other words, the gentleman voted with the majority this morning in passing through the tellers?

Mr. LONDON. Yes. I will let the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD show the attendance of Members. I do not want to be a censor, but I think too many Members are absent from the floor during the discussion of important legislation.

Mr. WALDOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. WALDOW. As I understand the gentleman's remarks, he referred to the city of New York and not the State of New York.

Mr. LONDON. That is so; and as to the New York City Members, it is quite clear that absence at a particular moment from the floor does not indicate absence from Washington.

Mr. THOMAS F. SMITH. Is it not a fact that 20 minutes before the gentleman made this statement—that he was the only Member here from New York City present—he spoke to me at that door?

Mr. LONDON. The gentleman can not do any more than I have just done when I made the statement that Mr. SMITH and Mr. RIORDAN were here during the day yesterday. I think that closes the incident.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment, for the purpose of obtaining the floor for five minutes.

Members of the committee, I have been interested and have spoken several times about the numerous peace proposals that have emanated from Berlin and Vienna and have made statements on the importance of a conclusive peace, warning the country against a peace without victory, a statement which was quoted from high authority. I now rise to say to you, in language that I do not want to be misunderstood, that I am pleased with the answer made by the President to the peace proposal. It leaves no chance for the enemy to gain by diplomacy what it could not win on the field.

The quick reply may jar upon diplomatic ears, but is justified as a rebuke to the double dealing of our enemy, and a forestalling of either propaganda to weaken the allies or time to rebuild shattered enemy lines.

The reply should be a guarantee against our taking a first step which must be followed by a second and third to the last. Discussion of "unbinding terms" in the dark, as suggested in the note, can result in no good, but, I fear, in great harm.

The Dual Monarchy is tottering. It has never been secure. The huge majority of her subjects are and have been longing for a chance for relief from the yoke of the Hapsburgs. The millions of Czecho-Slovaks in the north, Jugo-Slovaks in the south, and others, which together make up two-thirds of the entire population of Austria, are seeing the rays of promise in our official recognition of their rights as a people. This spells dissolution of the Hapsburg monarchy. The note reveals the seriousness of this situation and proposes steps to forestall the inevitable. Germany can not be unaware of its effect upon the destinies of the Hohenzollern house; hence her acquiescence.

If the rôle of Teutonism ever endangered the liberties of the world, that danger was never so appalling and imminent as now. The world must end that danger now or never. To enter conferences on the basis of the note means, in my judgment, four years of sacrifice all in vain. It offers time and conditions for successive crops of world tragedies. To do that now when the enemy is driven from post to post by the united powers of most of the world fighting against a horde led by a war-mad autocrat, and at the time the enemy of the world's liberties is being girdled with fire and flame and is about to cry enough, would be not only a crime against the suffering populations of western Europe and other peoples trampled upon ruthlessly, but a crime against humanity. It is the bully who, having prostrated his victim to the earth to trample upon and crush out all ability to resist his inhuman brutality, sees the strength of his victim steadily gathering and fears his grasp tightening, cries, "Hold! Enough! Let's quit now." The Teutons, breaking at home under the powerful grip of our armies on their front, are sick of war and wish to talk over "unbinding terms" of peace.

This reply should be an end to this peace offensive until the enemy is on its knees, its armies surrendered, and these people who have backed this orgy of crimes of terrorism may demand not of us, but of their rulers, that this war shall not only cease, but those responsible for it shall guarantee against a repetition of such a world tragedy. This condition will not be agreed upon in a peace conference. It must be commanded on the field, when the American Army is on German soil headed for Berlin.

That is my opinion of the reply this morning. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY. Does not the gentleman think it is perfectly apparent that the note of the Austrian Government was not intended to evoke any other reply from the allies than the kind it has had, but was intended as an appeal to their own people and an attempt to make them believe that Austria and Germany were not responsible for this war, and that the entente allies were responsible; that the whole purpose was that and nothing more?

Mr. FESS. I will say to my friend that that element is in the note and quite probably the dominant element. However, I would not be surprised if these powers felt that through the humanitarian impulses of our people we might make concessions that I feel convinced we will never make.

Mr. HARDY. There appears a secondary purpose—the hope of starting a division among the entente allies.

Mr. FESS. Yes; to divide the allies.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

(3) Taxes paid or accrued within the taxable year imposed (a) by the authority of the United States, except income, war-profits, and excess-profits taxes; or (b) by the authority of any of its possessions, except the amount of income, war-profits, and excess-profits taxes allowed as a credit under section 222; or (c) by the authority of any State or Territory, or any county, school district, municipality, or other taxing subdivision of any State or Territory, not including those assessed against local benefits; or (d) in the case of a citizen or resident of the United States, by the authority of any foreign country, except the amount of income, war-profits, and excess-profits taxes allowed as a credit under section 222.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, the last two speeches made have not been at all pertinent to the bill. Both of them were subject to a point of order. It is all right for those two speeches to have been made, but I want to give notice that hereafter we will insist that the speeches under the five-minute rule be confined to the bill. [Applause.]

I want to state that we ought easily to get through with this bill by Friday or Saturday, certainly not later than Saturday. We had six or eight days of general debate. The report upon the bill was filed on September 3 and has been in the hands of every gentleman in the House. That report states the changes made in existing law. We can get through with this bill by Friday if we confine our amendments to bona fide amendments for the sake of perfecting the bill and confine our remarks to a discussion of pending amendments. My hope is that we will finish this bill this week. We certainly can do it if we confine ourselves to the bill and to bona fide amendments. After we pass this bill, then my hope is that not to exceed a week will be consumed in disposing of the Agricultural bill, the agricultural extension bill, and the consideration of the Unanimous Consent Calendar and the Private Calendar. I think we can do all of that in the week following the passage of this bill. Then I am very hopeful that we can enter into some kind of a gentlemen's agreement and make it of record to adjourn three days at a time during the month of October, while the Senate is considering the revenue bill in the committee and in the Senate. If we can carry out this program, finishing this bill this week and finishing the other legislation the following week, we can all have the opportunity to go home to our districts and States and join in the liberty loan campaign. I presume every man here wishes to do that. If every man present will cooperate with the committee in facilitating the passage of the bill and the consideration of the several amendments to be offered, I am sure we can do this.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to say that the minority members of the committee, so far as I have conversed with them, and particularly the ranking member [Mr. FORDNEY], who has just stepped out, heartily indorse what the gentleman from North Carolina has said. There is every desire on the part of the minority to cooperate in carrying out the program just announced.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to state that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] left out, inadvertently no doubt, the emergency power bill now pending, which will be reported to the House this week. [Laughter.] Some gentlemen are laughing before they know what they are laughing about. The bill is to enable the increase of the output of power for shipbuilding purposes, the manufacture of munitions so assential to the prosecution of the war, and for like purposes. This House can not adjourn or recess until it acts on that measure if any Member expects to be reelected.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say that no man in the House will think of leaving here when there is any emergency legislation, and that we can not enter into a gentlemen's agreement unless every Member of the House consents to it.

Mr. SIMS. It is the welfare and protection of the United States that demands the passage of the emergency power bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Any one man can do it. All I ask is that the gentleman from Tennessee cooperates with us to get this bill through so that we can reach his bill.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman is exactly right, and I shall be glad to do it, but I did not want the gentleman to overlook this all-important bill.

Mr. POU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. POU. I want to say to my colleague that as far as I am concerned I shall most heartily cooperate in bringing about the desired result, but I would remind the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee that there are one or two matters pending before the Committee on Rules that have been temporarily laid aside until the water-power bill and revenue bill were disposed of. One of them is a bill from the Committee on Labor, and there has been a tacit understanding, I think on both sides of the Committee on Rules. that these gentlemen should have an opportunity to present their bill to the House. I do not think either one of these matters ought to take over a single day.

Mr. KITCHIN. The point that I am making is that the earlier we dispose of this bill the earlier we can get to the consideration of other necessary bills. I believe those bills that have been mentioned can be disposed of in a week.

Mr. POU. There is another measure that the President is urging for consideration, and that is the convict-employment bill.

Mr. GARNER. In other words, if we can pass this bill this week we ought to be able to consider all necessary legislation next week and be ready to take up the arrangement the gentleman has stated.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is correct.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it is wise to expedite the legislation as much as possible, so that Members can join in the movement throughout the different States for the liberty-loan campaign. I want to announce here that Cook County, in which the city of Chicago is situated, representing over two-fifths of the State of Illinois, has already found itself in the situation of being able to have the Democrats and Republicans who speak for the organization of both parties join in a written agreement that no political campaigning will be done by either party until the end of the liberty-loan campaign, and that every precinct worker in the Republican and Democratic Parties in that county, representing over 10,000 men, will be utilized; that instead of engaging in politics they will make a drive for the sale of liberty bonds; and that no politics will enter into the consideration of any question involved until after that drive is over. I hope that all of the States in the Union will enter into such an agreement.

Mr. GARNER. If it is as effective as the drive in politics you will go over the top about the second day. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. We have made arrangements, and it is in writing, and 10,000 men have volunteered to do this liberty-loan work.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I sympathize entirely with what the gentleman from North Carolina has suggested. I was the first one present who violated the rule——

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no; I was willing that the gentleman should present his matter.

Mr. FESS. The chairman will remember that a communication was put in the RECORD in which my name was used.

Mr. KITCHIN. I did not criticize the gentleman from Ohio nor the gentleman from New York, but I thought that some other Members on either side might consider it a precedent, and I wished to make an announcement.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will yield.

Mr. McKENZIE. In regard to the agreement which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has just stated as entered into between the Republicans and Democrats in Cook County, are we to understand that just as soon as they go over the top with the liberty loan, that agreement is at an end and politics begins?

Mr. MADDEN. No; the agreement continues until the end of the liberty-loan campaign, which would be on the 19th of October.

The Clerk read as follows:

(9) In the case of buildings, machinery, equipment, or other facilities constructed, erected, installed, or acquired on or after April 6, 1917, for the production of articles contributing to the prosecution of the present war, there may be allowed a reasonable deduction for the amortization of such part of the cost of such facilities as has been borne by the taxpayer, but not again including amounts otherwise allowed under this title for depreciation, exhaustion, or wear and tear. At any time within three years after the termination of the present war with the Imperial German Government, as declared by proclamation of the President, the commissioner may, and at the request of the taxpayer shall, reexamine the return, and if he then finds as a result of an appraisal or from other evidence that the deduction originally allowed was incorrect, the necessary adjustment of the taxes for the year or years affected shall be made, and the amount of tax due upon such readjustment, if any, shall be paid upon notice and demand by the collector, or the amount of tax overpaid, if any, shall be credited or refunded to the taxpayer in accordance with the provisions of section 252. In the case of a nonresident alien individual this deduction shall be allowed only as to facilities within the United States. In no case shall the deduction allowed under this paragraph exceed 25 per cent of the taxpayer's net income as computed without the benefit of this paragraph or paragraph (11).

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the paragraph, on page 15, line 21, the following: "Provided, That wherever the contract for the production of war material or articles contributory to the prosecution of the war or additional plant extensions or facilities necessary therefor makes provision or allowance for the amortization of plant extensions or facilities or for the depreciated value of the same, either before or upon the expiration of the contract no allowance or deduction shall be made under this paragraph."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, no one, I think, can consider this particular paragraph of the bill without some doubts and I might say some apprehension. It seeks to afford a flexible method whereby deductions or allowances from gross income may be made to the owners of plants which will at the end of the war be greatly depreciated in value, or perhaps entirely worthless for peace purposes and which have been amortized from earnings or otherwise. Personally, I am of the opinion that this paragraph ought to go out altogether, but I recognize the fact that these are extraordinary times and that extraordinary latitude must be given to the administrative officers of the Government in administering the law which shall apply to these unprecedented conditions. I have not had a chance to examine the contracts under which the war materials and articles contributing to the prosecution of the war are being made. I have studied with some diligence, however, the testimony which has been given before the various committees of the House and Senate touching the general character of these contracts, and I have read such of the contracts as actually appear in the testimony. These contracts show that in many instances provision is made in the contract itself for the amortization of the plant or for an allowance for the depreciated value of the plant at the end of the contract period. It seems quite apparent where the contract itself provides for amortization, or where, either by an allowance in the price or by some other method, consideration is given for the depreciated value of the property, that the Secretary of the Treasury ought not to have the power to make allowances as a matter of deduction from the gross income, because the matter is then not a question of income tax at all, but becomes a question of the readjustment of the contract which in the first instance was made by the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy and not by the Secretary of the Treasury. I want to call attention particularly and specifically to one contract which appears in one of the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations. This is a contract for the production of T. N. T. and the construction of additional facilities for that purpose. In that contract the following sentence occurs:

Of the said contract price of $0.435 per pound the sum of $0.105 is fixed as allowance for and toward the partial amortization of the equipment and plant referred to in article L.

Here is a case in which the contracting officer on the part of the Government in the contract for the manufacture of war material has made an allowance for the amortization of the plant extension necessary to produce it. It seems to me absolutely clear that in that case the Secretary of the Treasury ought not to have the power to make an allowance or deduction from the gross income for amortization because that allowance becomes not a matter of deduction of the tax, but the readjustment of a contract that the Secretary of the Treasury did not make.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am not sure I understand how far the gentleman's contention goes. Does the gentleman contend that in such a case as he has just mentioned a further allowance for amortization might be made under this contract?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Of course, the gentleman has examined the provisions at the top of page 15, where it provides—

There may be allowed a reasonable deduction for the amortization of such parts of the cost of such facilities as has been borne by the taxpayer.

The committee thought, or at least I thought, that that would cover just such cases as the gentleman mentioned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON. Of course, the contracts that have been made for war materials vary greatly in their terms, but many of them provide for plant extensions necessary for the production of war materials out of the funds of the corporation that is producing the material. In those cases the Government, recognizing the fact that the plant will be greatly decreased in value at the end of the contract period, has provided for amortization or has provided for the depreciated value of the plant in some other way. It seems to me that under those cases the Secretary of the Treasury clearly ought not to have the power to make further allowance because a further allowance in that case is not a matter of taxation or a deduction from a basis of taxation, but is a readjustment of a contract which itself defines and determines absolutely the rights of the parties to the contract. You have an absolute conflict here between the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of War, and you have placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury not the administration of this law, in the sense of collecting a tax, but you have placed in his hands the power to review a contract made by the Secretary of War which itself provides for the very things which you intend to provide for in this paragraph.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say to the committee that the gentleman's amendment would, of course, destroy the whole of paragraph 9. With his amendment adopted there would be no use for the amortization provision, and he overlooked the fact that although the contract given by the War Department may contain an amortization clause, the Treasury can not allow any amount of this amortization allowance as a deduction in computing net income under existing law. With paragraph 9 out, or with this amendment adopted, which would have practically the same effect as striking it out, the commissioner would have no power to allow any reasonable reduction from the income on account of amortization. Suppose we have a contract with a corporation that had to expand its plant and put in facilities that would not have been necessary to put in but for the contract; and suppose ordinarily the amount of the contract would have been $800,000. Suppose that owing to this expansion of the plant and the installing of new facilities, for the purpose of the contract, which would probably be worthless after the contract was performed, the Government says, "We will pay you $200,000 additional; that is, we will give you $1,000,000 instead of $800,000 for the articles produced." The gentleman's proposition would not permit the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to make any amortization allowance.

Now, under the provision in the bill the Commissioner of Internal Revenue would consider the whole $1,000,000, including the $200,000 amortization allowance under the contract, as income and treat it as income. The provision in the bill permits the commissioner and the advisory board to take the whole matter into consideration—the contract to which the gentleman refers and the income tax upon that extra $200,000—and, after considering the facts and circumstances, to determine what is a reasonable amortization deduction. They will not be bound by the $200,000 or the war contract at all. The provision in the bill carries out what the gentleman from Minnesota desired. I think it is a better proposition than his, and that the gentleman's amendment ought to be voted down; otherwise the Commissioner of Internal Revenue will be unable to make proper allowances for amortization.

Mr. ANDERSON. Well, does the gentleman from North Carolina think that where the Secretary of War has made a contract which provides for the amortization of a plant that the Secretary of the Treasury ought to be permitted to review that contract and practically to make a greater allowance for amortization by way of deduction from income tax?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I do. As a taxing proposition, they ought to be allowed to deduct more if this taxing board thinks that the amortization allowance is insufficient, and they ought to be able to require a great deal less amortization deduction than the contract calls for if they find the contract allows too large an amortization allowance.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, there is another very important matter which ought to be mentioned in this connection. In the first place, I think the gentleman from Minnesota is mistaken in saying the provision to which I referred in my interrogatory does not fully cover the whole matter. There is already provision by which the commissioner may take into consideration the amount already allowed and taxable in the way of amortization. This is provided in line 2. It is only such part of the cost of such facilities as has been borne by the taxpayer for which amortization may be allowed. For that reason there is no danger of duplication of the matter of amortization under this paragraph as it now stands, and where the contract fully provides for amortization no allowance can be made under this provision.

Another feature, which I think is quite important, is that it would be far better to have some provision of this kind than to have these contracts made as the committee found they were made in a great many cases—making allowance for all possible losses that could be imagined or conceived. These contracts were so drawn in many cases they made, as the committee thought, a larger allowance than was really justified except from the fact that the Government had to have the material contracted for and had to make such a contract as would result in the Government obtaining it. Now, if we have this provision in the law that reasonable amortization may be made in assessing taxes, it will not be necessary to make contracts with such wide margins. The Government can make a better contract, a lower contract, and the party who is entering into the contract with the Government will realize that the whole matter can be reviewed afterwards and such allowances made him as are proper and necessary. This, I think, is very important in this connection. The great trouble has been that the parties who make contracts with the Government can not look far enough into the future to determine just how they are going to come out, and, as a result, they make these contracts, as I have said, with extraordinarily wide margins, so that they are certain to result in a profit and may result in an unjustifiably large profit, but with a provision of that kind in this bill I think they will be able to make more reasonable contracts and the Government will benefit by it. For that reason I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota will not prevail.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I could not support the proposed amendment, because I think it would destroy the otherwise useful purpose of this paragraph. There is a class of contracts which have been made to which my attention has been called that are, perhaps, not fully or properly covered even by the provision of this paragraph. I refer to those cases where, in order to accommodate the Government in its demand for speed in building vessels of war, large expenditures have been made for facilitating the work by the construction of buildings and machinery which will be practically useless to the party making the expenditures after the war has closed. For them to take out of their income the enormous sum of money for the purpose of making these improvements, the money temporarily is advanced by the Navy Department in order that the work may be done quickly and at once. It seems to me instead of limiting this paragraph, there ought to be a provision in it so that the amount they expended shall be permitted to be deducted in making the return of income upon which return the income tax against them will be assessed. In order to facilitate the work, they have made these enormous expenditures, and this amount of money which has been taken and put into the plant will be practically useless to them when the war has closed. I have taken the liberty of discussing this branch of the subject with the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and do not propose at this time to interfere with the progress of the consideration of this bill by making a motion for an amendment, but I do raise my voice in opposition to the amendment which has just been offered, that it would destroy the efficiency entirely of this paragraph. It is only a provision for making a reasonable reduction for the amortization of such part of the cost of such facilities as has been borne by the taxpayer and, of course, not including the amount allowed for depreciation under the preceding paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment. The gentleman does not indicate where his amendment comes.

Mr. ANDERSON. In the same place as the other one, at the end of the paragraph just read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Provided, That wherever the contract for the production of war material or articles contributive to the prosecution of the war or additional plant extensions or facilities necessary therefor makes provision or allowance for the amortization of plant extensions or facilities or for the depreciated value of the same, either before or upon the expiration of the contract, such provision or allowance shall be considered in determining the allowance or deduction to be made under this paragraph."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, having in mind the suggestion of the chairman of the committee that the consideration of the bill be expedited as much as possible, I shall take only a moment upon this amendment. As I said a moment ago, the provision in the bill seeks to make an allowance in the way of deduction from taxable incomes for the amount paid for amortization or set aside for the amortization of plants or facilities necessary for the production of war material. My amendment simply seeks to provide that where amortization or depreciation has been considered and provided for in the contract itself, the Secretary, in making the deductions and allowances for taxable income, shall consider the provisions and allowances made in the contract. The proposition is perfectly simple. It seems to me it ought to be in the bill, and I hope the gentleman from North Carolina will accept it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I will say that the same reason against the other amendment stands against this amendment. I do not think it has any place in this bill. I think the Treasury Department should consider each individual case. We could not put in the statute any specific rule that will apply properly to each individual case.

Mr. ANDERSON. Who is levying these taxes? Are we doing it or the Secretary of the Treasury doing it?

Mr. KITCHIN. We are doing it In every tax law in existence some kind of an amortization provision is provided. Some call it an allowance for depreciation. Some have an amortization clause. We limit this provision. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] says, if anything at all should be done to this section it should be liberalized. We should, perhaps, take off the 25 per cent limit. I can conceive of a great many cases, which were suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], that 25 per cent would not cover. But we think, taking everything into consideration, that it is safe to limit the amortization allowance to 25 per cent of the taxable income. There were a great many suggestions from some of the industries of the country that it should be no less than 50 per cent. There was a suggestion from the Treasury Department at one time not to limit it; that 100 per cent total income may be necessary to amortize the whole plant and to allow the deduction for the whole income of the taxable year. But our committee, after considering the pros and cons of the question, decided it was safe to make the 25 per cent limit. I am sure the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] has not noticed the 25 per cent limit.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota, as I view it, is entirely unnecessary.

The provisions of the paragraph go even further than his own amendment in providing that where the loss is not borne by the taxpayer there shall be no amortization. For that reason I can see no necessity for his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make the following motion by way of amendment to the paragraph: Page 15, line 18, strike out the words "in no case shall the"; also lines 19, 20, and 21.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania: Page 15, line 18, after the words "United States," strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. There are certainly cases in which the limitation will work a grave hardship, and there ought to be no limitation, for where the expenditures in facilities amount to millions it will be in excess largely of 25 per cent of the profits, and an injustice is done by limiting the consideration of those who are called upon to exercise an equitable consideration of this subject. We leave it entirely in the power of the department to do justice. They are to make a reasonable deduction for the amortization of such part of the cost of such facilities as has been borne by the taxpayer. Why not, therefore, in fairness omit this limitation, which can on the face of things, as anyone will see, work an injustice?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not be adopted. The committee has given much attention and earnest consideration to that proposition, perhaps more than any one man in the House. When the thousands of returns are taken into consideration we think it would be pretty dangerous to strike out that limit, and that we might run into the very trouble which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] suggested. Maybe we should really put absolutely in the power of the commissioner and the tax advisory board the determination of a reasonable amortization allowance without limit, so far as these war workers and ammunition makers are concerned; but if we provide no limit they could allow such a large amortization allowance in any given year that the total net income for that year might be absorbed, and we would get no tax from these munition makers at all.

Mr. KREIDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. KREIDER. I am curious to know why this deduction is based upon the income rather than the cost of the building or machinery?

Mr. KITCHIN. This deduction is in addition to the deduction allowed for wear and tear and exhaustion, to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. KREIDER. I understand. I did not look it up closely, but I thought the other would be on the cost of the machinery.

Mr. KITCHIN. No. You see the income is what is taxed. We give them a part of the deduction from the incomes.

Mr. KREIDER. At the present time the Collector of Internal Revenue has made certain rules that apply to firms who are in the manufacturing business, permitting them to charge off for depreciation a certain per cent on buildings and certain per cent on machinery. That is all based upon the cost of the real estate and upon the cost of the machinery. This, I notice, is based upon the income. Now, then, if I understand it, if a party did not make a large profit he would not be permitted to charge off?

Mr. KITCHIN. If he did not make any profit at all he would not want any deductions. He would not be taxed. But, generally, I think you will find that those who have extended their plant to produce war material are not making small profits.

Mr. KREIDER. I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. KITCHIN. They are making large profits.

Mr. KREIDER. If the gentleman will permit, if a firm expended two or three hundred thousand dollars on improvements and extensions, the per cent to be deducted should be based upon the expenditures rather than profit, should it not?

Mr. KITCHIN. Probably in nine times out of ten he will make three or four or five hundred thousand dollars clear net profit, and he will be able to deduct an amount for amortization not to exceed one-fourth of his net income each year.

Now, there is another proposition in this section to the effect that three years after the expiration of the war the taxpayer may have the amortization reappraised. If he was not allowed enough they will reappraise it and allow him what it should have been.

Mr. KREIDER. If the gentleman will permit, in my judgment this is perhaps more largely in favor of the manufacturers of these munitions of war than if it were based upon the cost or the investment for the extension.

Mr. KITCHIN. The committee believes that the amortization allowance in any one year ought not to exceed 25 per cent of the net income for that year.

Mr. KREIDER. Would that be the proper thing, in the judgment of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; we think so. We think that three-fourths of the income of each year should be subject to taxes in order to help win the war. It might be that if the entire amortization allowance were permitted to be deducted in one year that it would take all the income to amortize the cost of buildings and plant and facilities that the taxpayer has installed. In other words, we wanted the Government to be sure of some taxes from these munition makers to help to win this war, and at the same time we were willing for them to have a part of the income with which to amortize the plant. That is the reason why we based it on the income.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. How would that work out in a case like this, a hypothetical case purely: A man is engaged in manufacturing and has a normal-sized plant. Suppose he is engaged in dyeing, and his plant is adapted to peace conditions, but that plant can be modified or transformed for use to the Government in making explosives, and so forth. Suppose they spend $200,000 in the enlargement of the plant because they have opportunity to sell those things to the Government. They are permitted in the amortization process which the gentleman refers to to charge off 25 per cent?

Mr. KITCHIN. Suppose their net income was $200,000. They could charge off $50,000.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Very well.

Mr. KITCHIN. In other words, we deduct——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But suppose the war should end in six months, as I hope it will, and those people have not had time or opportunity to make and fulfill contracts such as would reimburse them for any appreciable percentage of their investment. There is no relief for those people?

Mr. KITCHIN. I suppose Congress would have to give relief in that particular case. The bill contains other provisions with reference to exhaustion and wear and tear.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman can readily see that the fear of that might interfere with the enlargement of the plant.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, I do not recall a single instance that would at all compare with the supposititious facts stated by the gentleman. The fact is that the Government is advancing money to people for their extensions, and they have provisions in the contract by which the risk subject to a cancellation of the contract is more or less taken care of, and we are having a great deal of unnecessary fear over what will happen to most of the munition makers.

Mr. KITCHIN. The trouble is they are making too much out of the Government. Our concern is to guard the Government against them.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. You say the Government has made advances. Does not the Government require that those advances shall be paid back?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. Where that happens you will find that those items are figured in by the manufacturer on the price provided.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I am speaking of a fact, not hearsay.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think I am speaking of facts, too; and I think I have more chances of obtaining information that the gentleman has.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Not in this particular case.

Mr. SHERLEY. We are not going to make a law to deal with particular cases.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. It is an illustration of other cases.

Wherever there is a general contract price the statement of the gentleman might be thoroughly accurate, but where there is a particular price or percentage on cost it is not so. That is the case of most of these shipping contracts, where the destroyers were to be built.

Mr. SHERLEY. This is the rule, that wherever such a factor or risk has been taken by the manufacturer, it has been figured in as part of the contract made by the Government, and the manufacturer has not been so blind as the gentleman would have us believe. He has looked out for just that risk, and has urged it as one of the grounds for the price fixed for the thing he manufactures.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Apart from that, this is a limitation upon doing what your committee has conceded to be an act of justice.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not agree with the gentleman that 25 per cent is a wrong rule, and that because you give that you ought to give all. The statement of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] must be given some weight even by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and that is that there ought to be some revenue obtained during this year, and that if you permitted the entire amount of this investment to be charged off as against income, in many instances you would have to wait more than a year before you got any revenue out of this bill at all. The equity will be done, if there be an equity, on a 25 per cent basis on a larger period of time, but not at all at once. In the meantime this bill is for the purpose of raising revenue.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has manifested unusual earnestness about a simple question of an amendment which I offered, which, if the committee does not wish to adopt, they will reject, and I have no feeling about it. When the gentleman says that the suggestion of the chairman of the committee ought to be given heed to as well as the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, he is quite right, and I do not ask anyone not to give heed to the suggestion of the chairman of the committee.

I ask you simply to listen to certain facts that are stated. Now, the cry that is always raised on measures of this kind, where the equity of the case is against one, is, "Oh, we must raise the taxes to prosecute the war." That is the refuge every time when the equity side of the proposition is weak. I grant you we must raise the revenue to carry on the war, but that is no answer to a serious criticism of a piece of legislation when I say that that piece contains an unfair proposition. I argue that the proposed amendment will not interfere in the slightest degree with raising the revenue to carry on the war. What is it that my amendment proposes? It proposes to strike out these words:

> In no case shall the deduction allowed under this paragraph exceed 25 per cent of the taxpayer's net income as computed without the benefit of this paragraph or paragraph (11).

In the first place, as my colleague from Pennsylvania raised the question, why should it be based upon 25 per cent of the net income? Why should it not be based on a percentage of the amount used in producing the plant if it is to be amortization? I can not give you the exact figures at this moment, but I will illustrate a case in mind in this way: The cost of the plant may be $400,000; the amount of the net income may be $100,000; and you are limiting the provision here to 25 per cent of the net income, or $25,000, which would be 6 per cent and a fraction upon the total expenditure. Why put in a clause that would limit the power of your own trusted commissioner to make a reasonable deduction? I do not say that he will make an unreasonable one. I simply say that by striking out this paragraph you leave it entirely in the hands of those who represent the administration and the Government in this country in this trying period of war to do only exact justice; and where one offers an amendment of that kind he must not be treated as though he were hindering or obstructing the raising of revenue to prosecute the war. That is not my purpose, but my purpose is as clear and sure and free from such a criticism as any that the gentleman can entertain or express.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is unduly sensitive. Nobody is questioning his motive. I always assume, certainly, touching the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that his motive is a lofty one; but I am not willing to take an assertion of a premise as a demonstration of the correctness of that premise. The very case that the gentleman illustrates is not such a case of extreme hardship as to cause people to be unduly concerned. I think a concern that invests $400,000, which the gentleman assumes is going to be a total loss, and on that investment makes in one year $100,000 net, and then is permitted to charge off 25 per cent of that, and has to pay a tax on only $75,000 of the $100,000 which it has made on a $400,000 investment, is not in such a terrible state that it is a victim of the cruelty and avarice of a Governmeut that is engaged in war. Notwithstanding the gentleman's dislike of it, I still insist that the major purpose of this bill is to raise revenue, and that that fact must be kept constantly in mind. The trouble with much of the argument that is made on this floor is that it is made on the supposition that you can pass a law that will not work a hardship somewhere. You can not do that. The wisdom of man has never been such as to pass general laws, particularly tax laws, that do not work hardship somewhere. After all, it is a balancing and weighing of equities in the case. This bill proposes to raise $8,000,000,000. Unless I am very much mistaken, before it goes on the statute book it will have to provide for raising at least $2,000,000,000 more if we are to finance properly the expenditures of the Government in the prosecution of this war; and that being so, it is proper, without gentlemen being unduly sensitive, to suggest for their renewed consideration that the purpose of the bill is to raise revenue.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I feel impelled to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] and also to take issue with him as to one or two of his premises. There are many provisions of this bill with which I do not agree, but the bill has been built up very much as a tariff bill is built up. It is built up section by section, with a view of raising a certain amount of money, $8,000,000,000, which the President and the Secretary of the Treasury said must be raised by taxation, for the purposes of the war. There are many provisions of this bill against which the minority in committee voted, and probably would vote against upon the floor if it were not for the extreme urgency of raising this $8,000,000,000 demanded by the President and the Secretary of the Treasury to sustain our men in the field. If we were to strike down this provision limiting the allowances on amortization to 25 per cent, however, we would then do the very thing which is the last thing this Congress ought to do in passing a bill of this kind. We would be turning over to the administrative authorities the right to say whether the whole allowance should be made, according to the discretion of the administrative officer. Congress should place a check somewhere upon the administrative officer. That is good legislative practice. In this instance it has said to the Secretary of the Treasury and to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, "You may make allowances up to a certain point, but beyond that point, no matter whether you desire to favor or punish, you shall not go." That is the law as proposed. Twenty-five per cent may be too high or too low, but that is the limit to which we propose to permit the administrative officer to decide. We abdicate our powers as a great legislative body when we throw the doors down and let him do as he pleases.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Have you not delivered over by your vote in a dozen other enactments vastly more power than ever was contemplated by the amendment offered to this paragraph, which simply submits to the judgment of an officer the determination of the question of the reasonableness of the allowance?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am inclined to think the gentleman is right, but I recall distinctly that yesterday, when the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] offered an amendment to save the Constitution, my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] stood with him. We were then touching the pocketbooks of some of the great investors of this country by imposing taxes upon municipal bonds.

I admit that gentlemen have voted for measures since the war began that did to a certain extent infringe upon the Constitution of the United States and confer upon the Executive power which perhaps we would not have conferred in times of peace. But yesterday some of the gentlemen were very strict constitutionalists. We were then beginning to touch the interest on bonds. My point is that we must save as much of legislative authority as we can; we must preserve, so far as we may be permitted to do it in war times, the right of Congress to legislate, and in this particular instance, as representatives of the people, to say to the Secretary of the Treasury or to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, "You can go as far as 25 per cent, but you can not go the whole hog."

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has made a statement which is quite important. In effect he says that the other gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], who happened to vote as I did yesterday on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], did so in the interest of some people who would have income from such securities. If he did, he had a motive different from mine and, I am sure, contrary to that of the gentleman who offered the amendment. I would like to ask my friend from Pennsylvania, for whom I have high personal regard, whether he really believes that Members who voted yesterday against the right of the Federal Government to tax the obligations of the State did so because of interest in the personal welfare of the investors?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not impugn the motive of any Member who voted for "State rights" yesterday, but I suggest that it was a little inconsistent for gentlemen to stand so firm for State rights then, when we were touching the pocketbooks of the investors, who were not so firm when we were passing laws giving extraordinary powers to the Food Administrator and the Fuel Administration. Then we were inclined to forget about the Constitution. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

(10 (a) In the case of oil and gas wells a reasonable allowance for actual reduction in flow and production to be ascertained not by the flush flow but by the settled production or regular flow; (b) in the case of mines a reasonable allowance for depletion; (c) in the case of mines, oil and gas wells, a reasonable allowance for depreciation of improvements; such reasonable allowance in all the above cases to be made according to the peculiar conditions in each case and under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary. In the case of leases the deductions allowed by this paragraph shall be equitably apportioned between the lessor and lessee. In the case of a nonresident alien individual deductions under this paragraph shall be allowed only as to property within the United States.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to pass over this paragraph and return to it later.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the paragraph just read may be passed over, to be returned to later. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

(11) Contributions or gifts made within the taxable year to corporations organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, or educational purposes, or for the prevention of cruelty to children or animals, no part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual, to an amount not in excess of 15 per cent of the taxpayer's net income as computed without the benefit of this paragraph. Such contributions or gifts shall be allowable as deductions only if verified under rules and regulations prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary. In the case of a nonresident alien individual this deduction shall be allowed only as to contributions or gifts made to domestic corporations.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BANKHEAD: Page 16, line 16, after the comma, insert "or to the special fund for vocational rehabilitation authorized by section 7 of the vocational rehabilitation act" and a comma. In line 24, after the word "corporations," insert the words "or to such vocational rehabilitation fund."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I understand this proposed amendment meets with the views of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. KITCHIN. The committee considered the substance of the amendment, and think that it ought to go in.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 11, after the word "made," insert the words "or by individuals, partnerships, or corporations."

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. If the gentleman will pardon me, that amendment really belongs on the corporation side of the bill, which we will reach a little later. This is on the individual side.

Mr. ROBBINS. The purpose is to allow the same credit for charitable gifts made by corporations as those made by individuals.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. These are allowances for the individual. On the corporation side of the income tax, which we will reach presently, are similar provisions for corporations, to which this would be a proper amendment if the gentleman wants to offer it.

Mr. ROBBINS. I am not particular where it comes in, but it seems to me it is a very important amendment to be in the bill, because you are going to dry up the charities if you do not allow credit to corporations as well as to individuals.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will pardon me, I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee is right, the amendment ought to be on pages 18 and 19 in the list of deductions; and I suggest to the gentleman that he wait until we reach that part of the bill.

Mr. ROBBINS. Very well, Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw it and offer it later.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the pro forma amendment for the purpose of asking a question. This limits donations for the purposes mentioned in (11) to 15 per cent of the income of the donor. Is that right?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. That is correct.

Mr. CANNON. How broad is this—

Religious, charitable, scientific or educational purposes, or for the prevention of cruelty to children or animals—

That would cover any organization such as hospitals?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. It would cover any corporate organization for the purposes set out in these lines.

Mr. CANNON. My recollection is that the present law covers hospitals not organized for profit.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. On the corporations side, I would say again that the gentleman will find the exemptions and exceptions that relate especially to corporations. We are dealing now only with allowance to individuals in computing their net incomes.

Mr. GARNER. These are deductions to individuals.

Mr. KREIDER. That is all right, but the gentleman is talking about a hospital that may not be organized.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman will find the answer to that question in lines 14 and 15—

No part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual.

If the hospital or school is of such character that there are private stockholders, it would not be within the list of purely charitable organizations.

Mr. CANNON. Take the Red Cross, for instance, or the Y. M. C. A., or the Knights of Columbus, in war work.

Mr. BORLAND. They would undoubtedly be included under that list, but a hospital which charged its patients and distributed the dividends or profits would, of course, be excluded by this language. The same would be true of a school that distributed dividends.

Mr. CANNON. How about charities? In all of our cities, or substantially all, there are funds raised for charity to be dispensed by a board that operates without profit. Would that be deductible?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. No.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman will find the definition of "corporations" on page 1 of the bill to include associations, joint-stock companies, and insurance companies, as well as private corporations. The term "corporation" embraces any kind of an association to which an individual makes a donation.

Mr. BORLAND. I take it that the word "corporation" would include an organization which had a legal entity. It would not include an association in the ordinary sense—a club or a society.

Mr. CANNON. Is there a subsequent section where you can make deductions? Take it in the city of Kansas City—and I have no doubt it is so in one city of Kansas—I have no doubt that there are many thousands of dollars raised and dispensed by a board that is not operated for profit.

Mr. HELM. Such as the Salvation Army?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. We have a board of public welfare which is conducted by men who serve without pay. They are appointed by public authorities. They do collect quite a fund.

Mr. CANNON. Are they incorporated?

Mr. BORLAND. No.

Mr. CANNON. Are they included.

Mr. GARNER. They would be if they are an association of people. It makes no difference whether they are incorporated, if they are an association of people. Let the gentleman turn to the definition of "corporation" on page 1 of the bill which I just read. What is an association? It is a number of people who are associated together.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is sure that would change it.

Mr. GARNER. We undertake to do it in the definition here.

Mr. BORLAND. The word "corporation" ordinarily means a legal entity.

Mr. GARNER. I know, but we have changed it. We have undertaken to determine what a corporation is by stating specifically what it includes, and we say that it includes an association. Now, if you want to go to the dictionary and find out the definition of association, well and good. I think it means a number of people, whether organized under law or voluntarily.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

(d) Premiums paid on any life insurance policy covering the life of any officer or employee, or of any person financially interested in any trade or business carried on by the taxpayer, when the taxpayer or anyone financially interested in such trade or business is a beneficiary under such policy.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Tennessee a question. Suppose, as is a common practice in business, that a firm places insurance upon individual members of the firm for the benefit of the firm. According to this, such premiums paid for insurance would not be deducted as expense items.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. That is true.

Mr. KREIDER. That being the case, in the event the insured dies, or if the policy is a 10, 15, or 20 year term policy and expires and the insurance money comes in, should that then be considered as income? It would seem to me it would hardly be just to allow premiums to be charged as expense items and then, when the policy becomes due and payable and is paid, to include that amount as income.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Of course, in any kind of insurance investment the profits are the amount received back from the investment in excess of the amount paid in. That would be true of an annuity or any other insurance investment in the general sense. This provision, as was stated yesterday, was inserted last year in the Senate on account of the complaint which the Treasury officials made, to the effect that large stockholders of corporations were utilizing the corporations to take over and handle their insurance for them and in that way evade a measurable portion not only of their income tax but ultimately of their estate tax.

Mr. KREIDER. If the gentleman will permit, there may be abuse of the practice, but the point I want to make clear is this: There are many firms in business that have perhaps one valuable man or more than one who are essential to the business. This firm is perhaps a heavy borrower of money, and in order to negotiate their paper on the market and to secure large loans from banks they find it advisable and profitable to take out insurance policies upon these particular men, and they so notify the banks or their creditors that in case the individual who is responsible for the successful carrying on of the business should die the insurance becomes due and payable, and there will be cash to liquidate the debts; and, as such, it becomes an asset to the business, and the premiums are an expense item just as much as fire insurance premiums are.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I agree with the gentleman as to the existence of that business practice, but the gentleman will remember that even if that firm should in this case pay their income tax, it will not materially interfere with that phase of their business. It will not amount to enough.

We have talked a great deal here about exempting profits used in business and some of us have almost reached the conclusion that where any firm desires to use the amount of profits in business they ought to be exempted, but if we follow that doctrine to its utmost limit we would not have any profits to tax in the country. This is not really burdensome from the standpoint of the smaller business concerns who are in the habit of engaging in this practice.

Mr. KREIDER. My only point is this, that if it is not allowed as an expense of the firm, then if the policy becomes due, its income should not be considered as profit on the business.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. We tax the difference between the premium and the total proceeds.

Mr. KREIDER. I do not see it provided for in this bill.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. That is the method of computation.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(c) In the case of a single person, a personal exemption of $1,000, or in the case of the head of a family or a married person living with husband or wife, a personal exemption of $2,000. A husband and wife living together shall receive but one personal exemption of $2,000 against their aggregate net income; and in case they make separate returns, the personal exemption of $2,000 may be taken by either or divided between them.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I rise to inquire whether the Treasury Department has by regulation given any construction to the phrase "head of a family." I notice in the bill in a subsequent section you distinguish between a single person and a married person, but do not include the phrase "head of a family," which is part of this subsection.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Of course, the phrase "head of a family" is fairly well understood under our existing laws.

Mr. STAFFORD. In Wisconsin, for instance, the head of a family is considered a person who may be a bachelor who is supporting a mother or other dependent persons, and I wanted to know whether the National Government has given any construction to this phrase.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. This is the Treasury regulation:

For this purpose the head of a family is held to be a person who actually supports and maintains one or more individuals who are closely connected with him by blood relationship, relationship by marriage, or by adoption, and whose right to exercise family control and provide for those dependent individuals is based on some moral or legal obligation.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has furnished the information, and I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

(e) In the case of a nonresident alien individual who is a citizen or subject of a country which imposes an income tax, the credits allowed in subdivisions (c) and (d) shall be allowed only if such country allows a similar credit to citizens of the United States not residing in such country.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman in reference to this paragraph what is the construction to be placed upon the phrase, "if such country allows a similar credit to citizens of the United States not residing in such country"?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. That adopts the policy that is in quite a number of tax laws of the other countries. It proposes a reciprocal administration by this Government, which is now practiced by those Governments, that any other country willing to give a statutory exemption within this range to American citizens residing there, the foreign citizens residing here will have a like benefit.

Mr. WALSH. Well, of course, I appreciate that it may not mean the same amount, but it means the same character of exemption?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Well, is not subparagraph (c) changing existing law somewhat?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. There is virtually no change in that paragraph.

Mr. WALSH. Under existing law is there but one personal exemption of $2,000 permitted against the aggregate return?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. That is all.

Mr. WALSH. And the foreign country must have a similar exemption to that before the United States nonresident aliens can get that in this country?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. That is substantially it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee whether the phrase "head of a family" is new phraseology in subsection (c)?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. No; that was inserted in the act of 1916.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was under the impression that was new language.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

(d) The net income of the partnership shall be computed in the same manner and on the same basis as provided in section 212, except that the deduction provided in paragraph (11) of subdivision (a) of section 214 shall not be allowed.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 9, after the figures "212," strike out the balance of the paragraph.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill to this amendment. It proposes to relieve partnerships from this tax to the extent of 15 per cent of gifts they make to charitable purposes and to place them on the same basis that is now allowed under this bill to individuals. I propose when we reach page 39, at the end of paragraph 9, to insert a provision relieving corporations to the same extent as to gifts they make to charitable purposes. Now, the whole purpose of this amendment is simply that and nothing more. I think it is manifestly unfair, gentlemen of the committee, that corporations who contribute to the Red Cross, Y. M. C. A., K. of C., and H. A., and the local charities in connection with this war, whether church or State, should not be allowed the same exemption at the end of the year when they make up their income-tax report that individuals are allowed. Now, take my own district—and I know about that and we all know more about our own districts than we do about the country at large, and we illustrate what we mean from our own experience. The coal corporations of western Pennsylvania, when the drive was made for the first Red Cross $100,000,000 fund, were the largest contributors to that fund. I have in my district a half dozen corporations which gave $25,000, each voluntarily, to make up the quota which was assigned to the respective counties in which they exist. Every drive that has been made during this war the coal companies, coke companies, and manufacturing companies have contributed liberally out of their funds for that purpose, and so have the banks, so has every corporate interest throughout western Pennsylvania, and throughout the State, for that matter. Now, the individual, under section 11, paragraph 214, is allowed a certain credit up to 15 per cent, I believe, of the contributions made. Now, why is it wrong to allow a similar deduction—and that is all that this amendment proposes—as to partnerships (and later on I shall offer a similar amendment as to corporations) which are so charitably disposed, because corporations and partnerships are simply an aggregate of men who own the corporation and the funds they contribute? It is a contribution "en masse" what they might fail to contribute if acting separately.

And if we are not going to encourage these contributions we are going to dry up sources of charitable funds that are now open to these beneficent objects and stop a source for money that will not be available unless we encourage the continuance of this practice. It is most laudable; it is most liberal; it is most just; but if we refuse to treat them in the same way as individuals are in making like contributions, I submit to the gentlemen of this committee that we are going to stop this source of contribution.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Does not the gentleman recall that the Congress passed an act permitting national banks to contribute to the Red Cross?

Mr. ROBBINS. I do, and believe it to be a proper corollary to that act that we now allow them to have credit on their income-tax payments to the extent of 15 per cent of those contributions.

Mr. BORLAND. I am inclined to think the gentleman is right.

Mr. ROBBINS. I think it is a proper law now to enact to complete the plan already open for charity funds from that source.

Mr. HAWLEY. A partnership as such pays no normal tax and no surtax. The moneys earned by the partnership are to be distributed to the members of the partnership, and then each member pays his normal tax and his surtax; and gifts to charity will be divided among the members, and each one will have credit for his proportionate share of the gift. Partnerships, as such, will not make the contributions. These will be made by the partners severally.

Mr. ROBBINS. But the partners do pay an excess-profits tax if there is any excess profit.

Mr. HAWLEY. A partnership as such pays no excess-profits tax. The excess-profits tax is paid by corporations only under this bill. The normal tax and the surtax are to be paid only by the members of the partnership after the earnings have been distributed, and they will pay as individuals.

Mr. ROBBINS. An income tax.

Mr. HAWLEY. No tax at all.

Mr. ROBBINS. It ought to be allowed, because if given by the partnership it depletes money due the partners.

Mr. HAWLEY. It pays no income tax—neither the normal tax nor the surtax.

Mr. ROBBINS. This amendment would not alter the proposition. This amendment strikes it out so far as it applies to partnerships.

Mr. HAWLEY. As I understood the gentleman, he desired that partnerships be credited with gifts made to charity. There is no necessity for so doing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. ROBBINS. I ask unanimous consent for one minute, in order to answer the question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROBBINS. I simply strike out, on page 21, after the figures, lines 9 and 10, and the word "allowed," in line 11. It strikes out what you propose to impose on partnerships, so far as gifts are concerned, under that paragraph.

Mr. McKENZIE. If the gentleman's intention was adopted, would it not be possible for partners to get credit for 30 per cent instead of 15 per cent?

Mr. ROBBINS. No; it would not, because individuals are taxed under another paragraph altogether.

Mr. McKENZIE. But a partnership, not a corporation.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] yield for one question? As I understand the gentleman's contention—and I entirely agree with him, if I understand it correctly—whatever contribution the partnership makes—for instance, to the Red Cross or the Young Men's Christian Association—is counted in as income, and although the individual partner would never receive any of it at all, because it already would have been donated, yet he would have to pay taxes on it, because it is a part of the undistributed gain?

Mr. ROBBINS. And ought to be relieved from that. And that is exactly what this amendment does by striking out that provision. It introduces no new provision in the law, and relieves them to the amount of 15 per cent of such charitable gifts, which is the same credit given to individuals for donations made to charitable objects.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The income-tax law only defines two taxable entities, the individual and the corporation. It prescribes systems of deductions for those two business entities in computing their income for taxation. Now, partnerships not being recognized as a taxable entity under the law in any of these provisions for the purpose of taxation, I take it the House is not desirous of creating a taxable entity of a partnership for the sole purpose of a tax exemption.

Mr. BLACK. Is it not a fact that under this amendment the partnership in determining its gains for the year would include money that it had already paid out for charitable purposes, and that the individual partner, when he goes to make his individual return, would have to include in those gains, for the purpose of taxation, money that had been contributed to those charitable purposes and would pay, notwithstanding they had no chance in the world to receive anything from that source?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I was in the act of saying that individuals have preferred to be taxed individually rather than through the partnership with which they may be connected. Now, the law gives to the individual the fullest rights and latitude with respect to any rightful allowances or deductions in computing individual net incomes. The individual has handled all his rights and secured them, whether they arose in connection with the operation of his partnership or in connection with his own individual affairs. He preferred, I say, to handle those matters individually rather than to inject them into a partnership situation which the income-tax law does not recognize. And it is not contemplated that you shall go beyond the well-understood methods prescribed for an individual to compute his net income and take up a partnership situation and thereby very much confuse the plain methods of computing individual net income. It is an easy matter for an individual who owns a part of the partnership, unless he wants to advertise his partnership, for him to put the money in or take it out whenever he wants to devote it to any charitable or other purpose, just as all such individual partners do with respect to any and every kind of transaction they see fit to engage in.

Mr. SLOAN. Is not this an undue encouragement by legislation to invite a partnership to go beyond the purpose of an organization which is purely business, and not eleemosynary or charitable, but organized by two or more persons to do a particular line of business? And, if charity is exercised, it should be exercised after the division of this business, which is contemplated by the law, after the earnings have been made; and it would be stepping outside of our proper jurisdiction to endow a partnership with the power of making these charitable donations and then getting special credit for them, because that is no part of a partnership's ordinary business. It should be, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] suggests, remanded to the individual, letting the individual make his donation, whatever it is, and get his credit for it, not only from the institution but by the Government, which will release taxation if that is done. I think that exception should be made, and it should not be broadened.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The gentleman is correct. This tax law makes the individual, as far as it can, the unit of taxation. It does not undertake to put a surtax on corporations, but concentrates in the individual as much as possible all income from every source for the purpose of levying the higher rates. The citizen, as I conceive it, owes alike the double duty of paying taxes on his income and also making contributions to charitable purposes, especially in time of war.

I have noticed, and I have noticed it often, that persons are constantly coming here and asking for exemptions for every little item they happen to contribute to some charitable or like purpose. The truth is, under the operation of this law, carrying rates from 4 per cent up to 77 per cent, the man with the large income, which subjects him to a rate of 50 per cent, for instance, can contribute $10,000 or $100,000 to some charitable object and publish to the country the statement that he contributed such amount himself for that charitable purpose when in fact he did not do so. The Government contributed 50 per cent of it, and he took credit for it.

That rule applies all up and down the scale of income-tax legislation. Citizens all over the country ought to be willing to pay taxes on their total net income and then, apart from that, make such patriotic contributions to the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A., and other charitable purposes as their sense of duty suggests. They ought to be content to make them without coming back here to the Government and demanding exemption from their just share of taxes, which is a wholly different duty, a wholly different burden. I mention that, because the gentleman brought up the matter, as my own individual view.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I can not subscribe to the principle advocated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] in asking to give exemption from taxation to contributions of a partnership or of a corporation for some charitable purpose. We have before us a question of principle as to whether we should recognize the right of directors of corporations to parcel out the money, the property of other stockholders, for charitable or humanitarian purposes without express authorization. This bill allows a certain deduction to individuals amounting to 15 per cent of their net income, for contributions to charitable associations, but it does not recognize the principle that we shall encourage directors of large corporations to divert their earnings from the tax on excess profits or war profits, so that they will not be charged with the high taxes which this bill carries, by diverting those earnings for even such worthy purposes as the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A., or the Knights of Columbus.

We all know that it is foreign to the purpose or object of a corporation to divert the moneys of the corporation to such purposes, no matter how commendable they may be. Well might the directors of a corporation say, "We have contributed to the Red Cross, to the Y. M. C. A., and to the Knights of Columbus funds," when in fact they would be appropriating the property of others, and at the same time taking away from the Government the excess-profits tax which the Government needs in these times.

Under this bill we are appropriating 80 per cent of the earnings of corporations as a war-profits tax, and yet by granting this exemption we are putting a premium on the diversion of these funds to escape this tax by allowing them to be diverted by the board of directors for such humanitarian purposes as the Red Cross. We are in no wise dissuading the individual from contributing to the Red Cross or to any of these other humanitarian purposes, but we are preventing the corporations from diverting their funds and getting the benefit from that diversion of funds which belong to the individual stockholders, and to that extent relieving themselves of the duty they owe to contribute individually to these worthy institutions.

I am not in favor of that kind of charity camouflage. I believe the individual should contribute out of his own funds to these various purposes, the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A., and the Knights of Columbus, and not appropriate the funds of other stockholders who may perhaps contribute out of their individual earnings where the directors of these corporations are not contributing more than to the extent of the holdings they may have.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not recall whether or not the gentleman was among those who voted for the bill to permit the national banks to make contributions to the Red Cross.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no hesitation in saying that I voted against it on principle, not that I was not in favor of the Red Cross being subscribed to. As a matter of fact, the fund was oversubscribed at the time the resolution was considered in the House. I was opposed to the principle of allowing bank directors in charge of the funds of stockholders in their fiduciary capacity to divert those funds without the consent of the stockholders.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman will agree with me that it is better for a national bank under the restrictions imposed by law to divert some of its capital to charity than it is to allow individuals to devote part of their capital to charity and then receive exemptions for it. I admit it is a serious subject.

Mr. STAFFORD. I certainly believe that to permit directors to so contribute would be a violation of their trust. An exemption should not be granted to a corporation for charitable contributions as a method of tax dodging.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLACK. It is the difference between the corporation and the partnership. Under the general law in every partnership each partner must pay his income tax, whether the gains are distributed or not, and it amounts to this: That whatever charitable contributions the partnership makes, the partner has to pay it, because they are undistributed profits.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill is not framed on the idea of taxing the partnership as an entity.

Mr. BLACK. Certainly not.

Mr. STAFFORD. If this bill recognized that principle, then it would have to follow logically that you should exempt the partnership from the payment of taxes on those funds donated for humanitarian purposes if you would grant corporations the same privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. You would have to allow that same privilege to corporations if they would contribute. Now, here is a partnership whose profits are to be assigned to individual partners as partners, and they are to pay the tax as individuals. How difficult of calculation would it be as a bookkeeping process if the partnership should contribute to the fund as a partnership per se, and then, when the individual came along to make his return, he would have to go to the books to ascertain how much of the funds had been contributed to this humanitarian and worthy purpose. The gentleman can see how great a difficulty would confront the individual partner in making up his individual return under those circumstances.

Mr. BLACK. If the partnership goes ahead and does it as a partnership, it will have no right to deduct it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am opposed to the principle of allowing an entity, whether a partnership or corporation, to donate the property of others for a cause, no matter how worthy, but I favor the principle of permitting the individual to donate the property out of his own belongings.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

(c) In cases under paragraph (1), (2), or (3) of subdivision (a) the tax shall be imposed upon the net income of the estate or trust and shall be paid by the fiduciary. In such cases the estate or trust shall, for the purpose of the normal tax, be allowed the same credits as are allowed to single persons under section 216.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This section, giving the fiduciary the right to make the return of income, and providing that the net income of the estate or trust shall be computed in the same manner and on the same basis as provided in section 216, in effect gives the trustee the right to deduct gifts for charity, where it denies that right to partnership. It does seem to me that if a partnership, which is controlled by two or more active partners who can say what its policy shall be and who are handling their own funds, is forbidden to make gifts to charity and to deduct them, it seems rather a strange thing that a fiduciary handling the money of somebody else is permitted to do the same thing. Yet there does not seem to be any provision there excluding the fiduciary from deducting gifts for charity, because he may make all the deductions provided in section 216.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is the gentleman quite accurate in the statement that the law prevents a partnership from making contributions to charity?

Mr. BORLAND. No; I would not put it in that particular form—that it prevents a partnership making gifts to charity—but it says that in computing the net income of the partnership gifts to charity shall not be deducted.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is only for the purposes of taxation.

Mr. BORLAND. For the purposes of taxation. In other words, if a partnership makes a contribution to charity as a partnership, it must still include in its net income the sum which it has actually paid out for that purpose.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BORLAND. That is still included as a part of its income.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BORLAND. And it is charged against the individual partners as though it were income on hand.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Undoubtedly. Now, there is nothing about this law, if I have read it accurately, that authorizes a fiduciary, in violation of the laws of the State or of the Federal Government, to make contributions. In other words, is it not true that a fiduciary would be controlled by the laws of his State or whatever authority had control over it?

Mr. BORLAND. Undoubtedly; but suppose the fiduciary did make the contributions and undertook to deduct them in accordance with section 212; it would not lie in the mouth of the collector of internal revenue to say whether he had the right to do so or not. The collector of internal revenue would be bound by the fact that he had done it. He might have legal authority to do it and he might not; but if he did it, it would have to be deducted.

Mr. SLOAN. Is it not contemplated here that a part of the duty of the fiduciary is to administer the estate? And usually is there not a clause or a provision for charitable contributions, and does not this contemplate the direct charitable contributions that are named in the duty of the fiduciary as set out in the trust deed or trust document?

Mr. BORLAND. I do not know that I comprehend the gentleman's question exactly.

Mr. SLOAN. This refers to such charitable donations as have been made under the terms of the trust. For instance, an estate consisting of personalty or realty, or the two combined, is placed in the hands of a fiduciary, and he simply carries out the terms of the trust, under which a part of the income of the estate, or in a great many instances nearly all of it, is to be devoted to charitable purposes, to be given at intervals, or all at the end of the settlement of the estate, or under a thousand different conceivable conditions. I think this simply relates to the thing that he is definitely authorized to do. It does not charge him with the duty of contributing, neither does it sanction any contribution that he may make, not directly set out in the deed of trust or the document of trust, whatever it may be.

Mr. BORLAND. If I understand the gentleman's question correctly, I think it illustrates a still further vice of this provision. If the gentleman believes that a fiduciary under the terms of his deed of trust is required to pay out so much money to charity and then is permitted to take a deduction from the net income of the estate to cover those payments required by the deed of trust, I think that is a still greater evil that I had not called attention to, because the object of the law ought to be to tax the income of the trust as income, before it is distributed under the trust instrument; and if he is required to pay it out, either to an individual or to a charity in pursuance of his trust powers, he ought still to be taxed on the income of the trust, as it comes into his hands before he pays it out for any purpose. When he pays it out he does so in the discharge of his duty as fiduciary. He is doing that in pursuance of the trust and not as a voluntary act of charity on his own part. So I was talking about a totally different thing than was the gentleman from Nebraska.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended two minutes for the purpose of asking a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the gentleman's objection, it is that we are granting to the fiduciary agent deductions for contributions for humanitarian purposes and denying them to the partnership.

Mr. BORLAND. I did not put it in that form. I said no restrictions are put on the fiduciary, because he is controlled by local law, and we can not grant him any powers that he has not got.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not find in the bill any recognition of the right of a trustee to deduct for any contribution such as the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A., or the K. C. fund. I wish the gentleman would direct my attention to such authorization.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is probably right; it says it shall be computed on the same basis as section 212. I had in mind section 214.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume, then, that the gentleman finds that his argument lacks the foundation which he thought it had.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; I was proceeding on a false ground.

The Clerk read as follows:

(c) The credits allowed in subdivisions (a) and (b) shall be allowed only if the taxpayer furnishes evidence satisfactory to the commissioner showing the amount of income received from sources within such foreign country, Porto Rico, or the Philippine Islands, as the case may be, and all other information necessary for the computation of such credits.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to line 22, page 26, for the purpose of offering a clerical amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to return to line 22, page 26, for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 26, line 22, strike out the word "received" and in lieu thereof insert the word "derived."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

INDIVIDUAL RETURNS.

SEC. 223. That every person having a net income for the taxable year of $1,000 or over if single or if married and not living with husband or wife, or of $2,000 or over if married and living with husband or wife, shall make under oath a return stating specifically the items of his gross income and the deductions and credits allowed by this title. If a husband and wife living together have an aggregate net income of $2,000 or over, each shall make such a return unless the income of each is included in a single joint return.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It was this provision to which I referred when I was directing attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill where the phrase "head of the family" is found in section 216, subsection "c." This section is predicated on the idea of two classes, single and married. It does not recognize the class referred to in section 216, the head of a family, a single person having persons dependent on him. Is that an oversight, or is it the purpose to compel all single persons, although they may be heads of families, to make a return if their income is $1,000 and over?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. It is made comprehensive in that way so that the Treasury Department can determine what the facts really are. They make the return for the determination of the Treasury Department.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

TAX ON CORPORATIONS.

SEC. 230. That there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every corporation a tax as follows:

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 31, line 17, after the word "That," insert "in lieu of the taxes imposed by section 10 of the revenue act of 1916, as amended by the revenue act of 1917, and by section 4 of the revenue act of 1917" and a comma.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, that is to cover the corporation side, which is already covered on the individual side.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBBINS. Why do they make the returns to Baltimore, Md., instead of Washington?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The office is in Baltimore for this collection district.

The Clerk read as follows:

(a) In the case of a domestic corporation 18 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 236: Provided, That the rate shall be 12 per cent upon so much of this amount as does not exceed the sum of (1) the amount of dividends paid during the taxable year, plus (2) the amount paid during the taxable year out of earnings or profits in discharge of bonds and other interest-bearing obligations outstanding prior to the beginning of the taxable year; and.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 32, line 3, after the word "year" and before the semicolon, insert a comma and the following: "plus (3) the amount paid during the taxable year in the purchase of obligations of the United States issued after September 1, 1918."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman please explain the amendment? Some explanation should be made, because it has a very far-reaching effect.

Mr. GARNER. If they use this money for the purpose of buying United States bonds, they pay 12 per cent; if they do not use it for that purpose, or if they use it for any other purpose in the bill, they pay 18 per cent.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes; this makes the tax limit 12 per cent, with respect to this class of income.

Mr. MERRITT. It is a provision in the present law.

Mr. GARNER. It is an encouragement to buy bonds. If you buy bonds, it will be 12 per cent, and if you keep it in the Treasury, it will be 18 per cent. I understand that all corporations are to have a deduction for liberty bonds.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. A corporation which invests its profits in liberty bonds will be able to take advantage of the 12 per cent rate.

Mr. LONGWORTH. This is treated the same way as the amount distributed in dividends?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The tax of 12 per cent is limited to the amount that is purchased by the corporation during the taxable year?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes; and the amount distributed as dividends, of course.

Mr. STAFFORD. This has nothing to do with dividends. If a corporation invests some of its profits in Government bonds during the taxable year, it is to be charged only 12 per cent on that amount rather than 18 per cent.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Because that is a part of the profits and it is given a preferential consideration.

Mr. KREIDER. It may not be a part of the profits. This is an investment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, I understand that, as far as prior purchases of Government bonds by corporations are concerned, they do not get any preferential consideration at all?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. The corporation is taxed under the same rates, regardless of whether profits are distributed as dividends or invested in Government bonds?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is the intention that all purchases of bonds issued after September 1 of this year shall be given preferential consideration.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes. Mr. Chairman, has the amendment been voted upon?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not been voted upon.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KREIDER. I thought I understood this until I asked a question, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] shook his head as though I was wrong. I want to know whether I am right or wrong. If a corporation buys $100,000 worth of Government bonds and includes those bonds in its assets, is that not a legitimate investment?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The gentleman is perhaps thinking of the excess-profits provision.

Mr. KREIDER. No; I am thinking of this. I want to know whether the $10,000 or the $50,000 or the $100,000 worth of Government bonds which may be purchased by a corporation are considered an investment on which a 12 per cent tax or an 18 per cent tax must be paid?

Mr. GARNER. It has nothing to do with this.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The corporation may invest whatever amount it may see fit to invest of its profits during the taxable year in liberty bonds, as defined in the amendment, and on the amount of profits so expended it shall be required to pay only a tax of 12 per cent and not 18 per cent.

Mr. KREIDER. The gentleman presumes that the bonds were purchased out of profits. I presume that pressure has been brought to bear upon the concern so that they have borrowed the money and have bought $50.000 worth of bonds to help the sale of liberty bonds. Assuming that a corporation has made a profit, it is taxed 18 per cent on that profit, which will be reduced to 12 per cent upon such moneys as are actually needed in the business, and I think the intent is that the firm should not carry an unnecessary or idle surplus. If the money is not needed in the business they are supposed to pay it out in dividends, so that it goes into the hands of the individual and then will be included in his individual income-tax return. I have in mind corporations that have made money, but that have also borrowed money, and have more borrowed money than they are able to pay during the year. I want to know whether any money they have invested in liberty bonds is taxed on an 18 per cent basis, or whether it is only taxed on a 12 per cent basis.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. If a corporation has net earnings of $100,000 for the taxable year and buys $100,000 of liberty bonds, as provided in this amendment, the tax is 12 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 32, line 3, after the word "year," insert the following: "plus (3) the amount which is actually invested and employed in the business or is retained for employment in the reasonable requirements of the business, or is invested in obligations of the United States issued after September 1, 1918: Provided, That if the Secretary of the Treasury ascertains and finds that any portion of such amount so retained at any time for employment in the business is not so employed or is not reasonably required in the business, an additional tax of 15 per cent shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid thereon."

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] here has just called my attention to the fact that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] made a very able argument a few days ago in behalf of this amendment which I am now offering. This amendment is practically what the law is at the present time. The present law allows a conservative corporation to set aside a certain amount of its undivided profits to take care of any of its future business requirements. Now the law as proposed puts a premium upon bad business. Any good, conservative business organization or any bunch of directors—a good set of directors—will always set a reasonable amount aside each year as a surplus or from among their undivided profits to take care of any emergency which might arise. Now, the provision of this amendment which I am now offering allows the Secretary of the Treasury to take care of this matter, see that the corporation does not abuse it, and to see that if it is abused there is placed a large penalty upon the corporation and in addition to that a penalty of 15 per cent. Now, modern business methods require that they keep a certain amount on hand at all times of their undivided profits. I want to call your attention to a hypothetical case. Assume we have organized a corporation at the beginning of the year 1918, say January 1, 1918, say for $2,000.000. They start in to do business. Suppose they have charged off for depreciation and depletion and other deductions and after that they have a net income of $1,000,000. The prewar exemption of 10 per cent on capital invested was $200,000. The specific exemption would be allowed them of $3,000, making a total of $203,000, leaving $797,000 subject to a war tax of 80 per cent. This 80 per cent would amount to $637,600. Now, allowing the specific exemption of $2,000 would make $639,600. That would leave subject to net income tax $360,400. Then take the income tax of 12 per cent, $43,248. Now add those taxes together and you have $680,848, which would leave a balance after deducting from the million-dollar profit of $319,152. Now, suppose that is paid out as dividends. The corporate income subject to normal tax is $360,400. After paying $319,152 out as dividends would leave you a difference of $41,248. Now, the difference is taxable at an additional 6 per cent; this 6 per cent difference is $2,474. To what account can this additional tax of $2,474 be charged? Now, suppose this company is a good, conservative company. They have $680,000 worth of taxes to pay. They have money on hand and desire to carry it over until the next year for the purpose of paying those taxes when they come to make payment in March. Now, you place a 6 per cent penalty upon the company for being conservative and being able to take care of their transaction. In other words, you charge them about $40,000 for being conservative. Now, that absolutely is not right; it is unjust, and there is no reason in the world why such a penalty should be placed upon a good, conservative corporation. Now, if they pay that out in dividends and the tax comes due in March, where are they going to get the money to pay it?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman desires to proceed for two minutes additional. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Now, it will be necessary for this company to go and sell some of their assets, probably sacrifice them, in order to get the money to pay this $680,000 I mentioned, and I sincerely hope this House will see the justice of this amendment and accept it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the vice of the gentleman's argument, like that of all gentlemen who have taken the same position, is that he assumes that this 6 per cent differential is a penalty. In other words, they argue that 12 per cent is the normal tax on corporations, and 18 per cent is a surtax, whereas precisely the contrary is true. The 18 per cent is the normal tax on all corporations and 12 per cent is the bonus for distribution. The committee has acted logically in this matter. We have tripled the normal tax on all individuals. We have raised it from 4 to 12 per cent. The present normal tax on corporations of 6 per cent is treated in the same way as the income on individuals, and therefore the normal tax on corporations, under this law, is 18 per cent and not 12 per cent. I admit this is a new policy. So far as I know, there is no precedent for it in this country, but let me call your attention, gentlemen, to the way Great Britain treats corporations. There they have a 30 per cent tax on all amounts undistributed. They impose a 30 per cent normal tax on all profits undistributed and no tax whatever on the amount distributed in dividends. So there the bonus is much greater in favor of the distribution of profits as dividends than it is here. It has seemed to me that it is wise public policy to encourage a reasonable amount of distribution in dividends, particularly in war times. The temptation to very rich men who have their money in corporations and who control the directorate is to have all the money left in surplus and not distribute it, so that they will not have to pay any individual surtax. By this provision we are, I think, simply encouraging the distribution. It does not force any distribution, but it encourages the distribution of a reasonable amount of the net profits of the corporation. Of course, any conservative corporation, with or without this provision, will keep a certain amount of their profits in surplus to provide for conditions which can not be anticipated. Now, we have gone pretty far to-day, we have gone pretty far since this bill was first introduced, in extending the exemption of the distribution of corporate profits.

We allow all that is distributed in the payment of outstanding debts to carry the lower limit of 12 per cent. We just a few moments ago adopted an amendment which allows a corporation to pay tax at the lower rate on all of their profits that they may invest in liberty bonds. It seems to me, gentlemen, that this is not a harsh method of treating the corporations at all. It is simply subjecting them, as we do individuals, to the normal tax and virtually offering them a present for distributing their profits. It comes to them if they do one of three things, either distribute their profits among their stockholders, hold it to pay their debts, or buy the forthcoming issue of liberty bonds.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Suppose it is a small bank in the country. You know that at every meeting of the directors of the bank on the 1st of January they usually go over the paper and charge off the bad paper in that bank; now, if you compel them to distribute all of their profits on the last day of December what are they going to charge this paper to?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman imputes to me a knowledge which I lack, as I am not a director in any bank and have never been present at a directors' meeting of a bank. But even if they have been unfortunate and have not sufficient profits to distribute in dividends they pay the normal tax, just as you and I will pay the normal tax on our incomes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CHANDLER].

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(b) In the case of a foreign corporation 18 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 236: Provided, That the rate shall be 12 per cent upon so much of this amount as does not exceed the sum of (1) the amount of dividends paid during the taxable year to citizens or residents of the United States or to domestic corporations or partnerships, plus (2) the same proportion of the amount paid during the taxable year out of earnings or profits in discharge of bonds or other interest-bearing obligations outstanding at the beginning of the taxable year which the amount of gross income of the corporation from sources within the United States bears to the amount of its gross income from all sources within and without the United States.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 32, line 16, after the word "States" and before the period, insert a comma and the following: "plus (3) the amount paid during the taxable year in the purchase of obligations of the United States issued after September 1, 1918."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

(4) Domestic building and loan associations and cooperative banks without capital stock organized and operated for mutual purposes and without profit.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DALLINGER: Page 33, line 4, after the word "associations," strike out "and" and insert after the word "banks," in line 5, the following: "and cooperative-store societies."

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to exempt from the corporation income tax cooperative-store societies that are organized for the sole purpose of enabling the members to obtain commodities at cost.

There are two classes of these societies—one composed of organizations of laboring men, often near large industrial plants, and the other composed of students attending many of the universities and colleges of the country. In both cases the object is to enable persons of limited means to purchase the things they need at cost.

Now, I have offered this amendment at this particular place in the bill so that by no possibility can organizations that call themselves cooperative stores and are really money-making institutions obtain the benefit of the exemption, because, if the members of the committee will notice the form of the amendment, the cooperative-store societies are subject to precisely the same limitations as cooperative banks and building and loan associations. They must be "without capital stock, operated and organized for mutual purposes, and without profit." Now, these stores that I speak of are stores organized under what is known as the "Rochdale" or "Tintag" system. This system originated in England more than half a century ago, the first society being known as the Rochdale Society of Equitable Pioneers. A few people get together, chip in a little capital, just enough to start the enterprise; and, of course, it being impossible to charge for the commodities exactly what they cost, for the reason that the cost can not be ascertained in advance, a reasonable price is charged, and then, after all the expenses of management are paid, dividends are returned to the members of the society in accordance with the purchases made; in other words, a rebate is given to each member according to the amount that he has purchased. And the net result is that the member does get the commodity at the actual cost price.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BORLAND. Do not these stores sell to nonmembers?

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, in case they do, that can be easily regulated by a ruling of the Internal Revenue Department. My idea is to limit the exemption entirely to stores that sell to the members and to the members only.

Mr. BORLAND. Are there any such stores that sell only to members?

Mr. DALLINGER. I think there are; but if there are not, they certainly can limit their sales to members if they desire to avail themselves of the exemption. It is easy for them to require a member to show his card before he can purchase. I do not think they ought to be exempt on profits they make from nonmembers. My object is to limit the exemption entirely to those societies which sell only to members and which therefore are "operated and organized for mutual purposes and without profit."

Mr. EMERSON. What constitutes a member?

Mr. DALLINGER. The Harvard Cooperative Society, with which I used to be familiar, allowed any student to join upon the payment of a small annual membership fee. In the case of stores carried on by labor unions I presume that any member of the union in good standing is eligible to membership.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Are salaries paid to the officers of these societies?

Mr. DALLINGER. Not to the officers of the society. The board of directors, however, employ a business manager, who is paid a salary, just as in the case of cooperative restaurants down at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. There the employees employ a manager to manage the business for them, who buys the food and hires the necessary help.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Rochdale system, as I recall it from old labor days, was purely a mutual system?

Mr. DALLINGER. Purely.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And such a system, I presume, if carried out in that form of organization would be exempt under the existing law.

Mr. DALLINGER. How? There is nothing in this bill referring to cooperative stores, although there is such a provision later on with reference to mutual fire insurance companies.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Except such business as was done outside of the membership; and if business were done outside of the membership the gentleman does not object to its being taxed, and it would be taxed under existing law. But so far as the mutual part of the business is concerned, I presume that would be exempt.

Mr. DALLINGER. Then, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania can not have any objection to the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the amendment is superfluous.

Mr. DALLINGER. The wording would be "and cooperative store societies operated for mutual purposes and not for profit." If there is already such a provision in the bill applying to cooperative stores, as well as to cooperative banks, I wish the gentleman would point it out. I certainly do not desire to add any superfluous language to this very carefully drawn bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It seems to me that the amendment is not necessary, because if it is a mutual and cooperative business it would be exempt under these provisions, which are also the provisions of existing law; and if business is done apart from membership, that would be taxed, and the gentleman does not object to its being taxed, as I understand.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the feeling of my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] in view of the fact that he represents the city where Harvard is located and to which his amendment directly refers in connection with the cooperative store there conducted. There are stores similar to that in many of the educational institutions of the country, probably not as large as the one at Cambridge, but stores where the students can secure at somewhat lower prices the articles needed by them in the course of their studies, and other things as well. But practically it is intended, as I recall, to have an establishment where stationery, books, and the usual supplies for students can be obtained at a less price than if bought in a regular store.

So far as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts is concerned, I think there would be very little opposition to it if limited to just that sort of a store.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. But it is possible to secure that sort of an amendment that would not open the door to all kinds of cooperative organizations.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Why should we legislate for Harvard any more than for any place else?

Mr. TREADWAY. I was coming to that point in opposing the amendment. As the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] suggested in his inquiry, if other than members could secure the goods at the prices charged at these stores there would be no provision against anybody coming into these cooperative stores and purchasing goods at the prices charged to the members. It is absolutely impossible, Mr. Chairman, to exempt this form of a store and not open the door wide to all kinds of store organizations; and therefore the committee, after due consideration of the amendment this morning offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, which he presented to the committee in advance, were unanimous in their opposition to it, and hope that it will not be adopted.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. DALLINGER. Will the gentleman please point out how there can be any door opened, the way the amendment would read in that particular section?

Mr. TREADWAY. There is no question but that the intention of the gentleman from Cambridge was to limit it directly to college cooperative stores, but——

Mr. DALLINGER. No; Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TREADWAY. But it is impossible, Mr. Chairman, to secure that sort of an amendment that would hold, and not permit all kinds of cooperative organizations to secure the benefit of the exemption which he has in mind, directly applying to one kind of an organization.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. DALLINGER. I want simply to state to my colleague from Massachusetts that this amendment of mine not only applies to college cooperative stores but to all stores operated under the same system, operated simply and solely to enable the members to get the things they buy at cost.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is a very laudable desire; but, if carried to the extreme, where would there be any profit secured through retail sales? If the gentleman's idea were carried out in full there would be no retail stores in the country other than those kept for members under the cooperative process, and any form of revenue derived therefrom would be absolutely unsecured, either by the Government or the stockholders in the store. It would be a cooperative Government, practically, if the gentleman's theory were carried to the full limit.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would like to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] that if he will limit his amendment to the Harvard Cooperative Society I will support it.

Mr. TREADWAY. It is unnecessary to say that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] took that same position in the committee. If it were confined to Harvard, he would advocate it. Otherwise he would be opposed to it, and the committee was opposed to it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, we are engaged in serious business, if I understand the situation, and I do not think we ought to be trifled with. I think amendments of this sort are intended to trifle with the serious situation that confronts the Government of the United States. There are many things in this bill that perhaps ought to be amended because there is merit in suggested amendments, but there is absolutely no merit in this amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER], and I can not sit idly by here and listen to that sort of an amendment and let it go without protesting against it.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I do not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MADDEN. I presume, of course, that the gentleman presented his amendment in good faith. But he should have had sufficient vision to realize that Harvard is not the only institution in the United States, and that those who can attend Harvard can afford to buy their food and their supplies, and that there are other people who are a good deal worse off than those who are permitted to attend Harvard who are compelled to pay the tax and to pay the high prices that are charged for commodities.

If the gentleman from Massachusetts wants to offer a real amendment to the bill, let him offer it to some section that needs amending. But we are here to raise $8,000,000.000 and not to trifle with the public. I apprehend this bill will be passed without amendment, and the sooner it is passed the happier the American people will be, for they are waiting for the opportunity to pay the taxes that are imposed upon them under this beneficent measure. Do not trifle with it any longer, but let us pass it and get it done, and do not offer amendments that are intended to be jocular, as the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts evidently is.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inform the gentleman from Illinois that the amendment which I have offered in good faith is not intended to be jocular and is not a trifling amendment, but is of vital importance to labor organizations all over the country. I should like to ask the gentleman if he can give the House any reason whatever why the cooperative stores that some of the laboring men in his own district have established should not be exempt from the corporation tax just as much as the building and loan associations? I should like to have him answer that question.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, the gentleman is trying to play peanut politics, thinking he can get some votes from the students at Harvard by the introduction of an amendment like this. This is no place for politics and no time for politics. [Applause.]

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word simply to ask the chairman of the committee if he knows how these cooperative societies are treated in the English act? There are laboring men's societies over there which operate very large cooperative stores, doing an enormous business, enabling the laboring men who are members of them to buy at cost.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand in Great Britain they were exempt before the war, but that since the war the tax applies to them all throughout Great Britain.

Mr. PLATT. Is the gentleman sure of that?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is my information; yes.

Mr. PLATT. Of course, if that is the case, perhaps the same provision should be applied here, but I do not see why they should not be exempted. They do not make any profit.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

(2) All interest paid or accrued within the taxable year on its indebtedness (or, in the case of a foreign corporation, the proportion of such interest paid which the amount of its gross income from sources within the United States bears to the amount of its gross income from all sources within and without the United States) in excess of the interest received free from taxation under this title.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which is the same interest amendment that the House adopted this morning with reference to individuals.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 36, line 13, strike out the parenthesis and insert a comma; line 17, strike out the parenthesis and all of line 17 after the parenthesis and all of line 18 through the word "title."

Mr. MADDEN. I should like to have the section read as it will read when it is amended.

Mr. KITCHIN. It is exactly what we passed this morning as to individuals. This applies to corporations.

Mr. MADDEN. What did we pass this morning? I am not a mind reader.

Mr. KITCHIN. We struck out the words—in excess of the interest received from taxation under this title—

so that the corporation will be able to have all the interest it pays on its indebtedness deducted.

Mr. MADDEN. This applies to individuals, does it?

Mr. KITCHIN. This amendment applies to corporations. We passed the amendment as to individuals this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

(9) (a) In the case of oil and gas wells a reasonable allowance for actual reduction in flow and production to be ascertained not by the flush flow but by the settled production or regular flow; (b) in the case of mines a reasonable allowance for depletion; (c) in the case of mines, oil and gas wells, a reasonable allowance for depreciation of improvements; such reasonable allowance in all the above cases to be made according to the peculiar conditions in each case and under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary. In the case of leases the deductions allowed by this paragraph shall be equitably apportioned between the lessor and lessee. In the case of a foreign corporation the deductions under this paragraph shall be allowed only as to property within the United States.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request as to this provision that was made with respect to the same provision on the individual side; that is, that it be passed for the present, with an agreement to return to it later.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the consideration of the paragraph just read be passed for the present, to be returned to hereafter at the pleasure of the committee. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ROBBINS: Page 39, after line 8, insert as a new paragraph as paragraph 10:

"(10) Contributions or gifts made within the taxable year to corporations organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, or educational purposes, or for the prevention of cruelty to children or animals, no part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual, to an amount not in excess of 15 per cent of the taxpayer's net income as computed without the benefit of this paragraph. Such contributions or gifts shall be allowable as deductions only if verified under rules and regulations prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary."

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment to paragraph 10, found on page 16 of the bill, places an exemption to the extent of 15 per cent on contributions enumerated in the provision when made by individuals. It is offered for the purpose of placing corporations on the same basis as individuals as to charitable donations. The amendment offered a few moments ago as to partnerships was met by a strong objection on the part of the committee that the income tax is collected from the individual partners after it is distributed, and that does not apply to funds still in the partnership and undivided. In considering the objections made by the members of the committee to the proposition as applied to partnerships, which I presume will be reiterated now, it appears to me they do not apply, because the proposition as to partnerships went down on the objection made by the gentleman from Oregon, that such tax was not assessed against funds as partnership funds. I will not dwell on that now, although I think the amendment ought to have prevailed; but such objections have no application to this amendment. The gentleman in charge of the bill argues that to allow corporations to contribute out of their net earnings for charitable purposes would defeat the payment of income tax to the Government.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. In a moment. That is what the gentleman said. I do not want to misquote him. He said that to allow an exemption of 15 per cent would encourage contributions to charity and thereby relieve them from the payment of the income tax.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I stated that instead of being subjected to a rate of 50 or 75 per cent, corporations would only pay 6 per cent.

Mr. ROBBINS. This abatement of 15 per cent comes out of the whole income tax whether it is war-profits tax or excess-profits tax, whichever they have to pay. In no case would it reduce the tax of a corporation from 75 per cent to 6 per cent. Such could not be the effect of this amendment. Now, these corporations are assessed according to the population of the various communities. In my own county, where we have a population of over 300,000, many of our people are workmen in the mines, in the factories, and industries, and they are not expected to and can not contribute the amount required to make up the vast sum needed by the Red Cross and the Young Men's Christian Association and the Knights of Columbus and Hebrew Association and other charities that are assessed against the communities in which they live; but the corporations come forward and make up the grand total. This is in the interest of the poor people, and corporations ought to be encouraged that it is right and proper for them to so contribute and not be discriminated against. They ought to be stimulated to contribute, and they ought to be allowed an exemption of 15 per cent just as an individual is by this bill allowed this exemption or credit on account of income tax. I think this amendment ought to prevail. It is right and just that it should prevail, and, moreover, it was urged here that it was a misapplication of corporation funds to contribute any amount to charity. That is not the case. The corporation surplus or accumulated earnings can be contributed by those who are in control of it. If the stockholders object, they can stop it. We have legalized it in the case of national banks. We have authorized them to make contributions, and why not in the case of other corporations?

Mr. GORDON. It is a violation of their charters.

Mr. ROBBINS. Oh, no, it is not; that is a mere inference of the gentleman from Ohio. The fact of it is that all corporations are asked to contribute—stores, banks, coal companies, coke companies, railroad companies—and they do contribute for all these purposes. If we do not say that they are entitled to some consideration, they will not contribute, and where, then, shall we get the money? We must get it from somewhere. We are on the point of attempting to raise $170,000,000 for the Red Cross, for the Y. M. C. A., the K. of C., and the H. A., and other allied charities. Where do we get this money? It is to be raised by voluntary contribution. It is a great national charity—the greatest ever undertaken by any people for the benefit of our soldiers at the front. We ought to encourage every means by which this money can be contributed. One great source, and one unavailing source, from which we can get the money is our corporations in the United States. There is where it comes from and where it is expected to come from.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do we exempt the funds that corporations invest in liberty bonds?

Mr. ROBBINS. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are they not more necessary to carry on the war than these contributions to charity?

Mr. ROBBINS. Not a bit more, but quite as much. The gentleman is not familiar with this matter.

Ask the men who return from the trenches, ask the men who have been in the war, who know something about its hardships and sufferings, where the greatest help is the men get, and they will tell you that it is from the Red Cross, it is from the Y. M. C. A., from the Knights of Columbus, and the Hebrew Society—organizations which stand up behind the firing line and administer those charities and acts of kindness that the United States Government can not and does not pretend to administer. [Applause.] The Government of the United States, my fellow committeemen, has recognized and is encouraging these acts of charity by these societies because they supply a place which the Government can not and will not fulfill, and I am pleading here for equity and justice for those who are putting funds in the hands of these charitable organizations that they may carry out these great and beneficent objects.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I want to support the gentleman's amendment, but I notice that he has copied literally section (11), on page 16, the concluding sentence of which is as follows:

In the case of a nonresident alien individual this deduction shall be allowed only as to contributions or gifts made to domestic corporations.

I think that ought to be stricken out.

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes; that should be stricken out, and I ask unanimous consent to so modify the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment by striking out the last sentence. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBBINS. These corporations make charitable contributions generally in three ways:

First. The directors vote the money and ask the stockholders to ratify their action.

Second. The directors vote the money in the form of special dividends, mail the checks to the stockholders, and request them to indorse and return them, so the money can be contributed to the charity named.

Third. The directors in a very large or very small corporation assume the responsibility after having an expression on their corporate acts at an annual meeting on this or kindred acts.

Can there be any moral wrong or violation of charter rights in such acts upon the part of a board of directors of a corporation? Of course not. Such acts are not ultra vires. The charter of a corporation is not violated by such acts of its directors. But charity is helped and the sufferers at the front are cared for, and the world is better for such donations.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, speaking individually, I think this character of relief ought to be withheld from corporations, and I also think it is not good policy to insert or retain that relief upon the individual side even. As I indicated awhile ago, the citizen is under as high an obligation to make proper contributions, when he is able to do so, to meritorious charitable organizations, such as the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A., and others, as he is to pay his full share of taxes; and it is almost as logical under present war conditions for a citizen to ask for a tax rebate or deduction upon a gift that he proposes to the Red Cross as it is to ask for a gift rebate or deduction upon the just amount of taxes due the Government computed upon his full income. A man, subject to income surtax of 75 per cent, who makes one of these contributions makes only a 25 per cent contribution, as I indicated awhile ago. The Government makes the other 75 per cent and the individual gets the credit for it. My individual view is that it is bad policy for Congress constantly to be acceding to every request that comes in here from some one who has made a gift, allowing him to inject that into the computation of his legitimate tax obligations. I can see a much stronger reason for the contention as to individuals, and I take it that that is the way in which this individual provision forced itself into the law last year. The tax on individuals was as high as sixty-odd per cent, and when an individual got credit for one of these gifts in computing his income surtaxes it meant something to him; but the corporation is exempt from this high system of surtax rates under the effort of the law to concentrate income from all sources in the individual and make him the real criterion for the imposition of the tax in its most comprehensive form; and it is quite a different principle for an individual subject to that high scale of graduated rates, if there is any principle in this matter. He is, at least, on stronger grounds when he asks for relief with respect to gifts that he makes than is the corporation, which is subject only to the normal tax. I need not repeat the arguments that were made when the bill was pending to permit national banks to make contributions—the reasons of public policy, the prohibitions in different State laws against such corporations and other associations making any gift. My opinion is that Congress could not do a wiser thing than to defeat this amendment, and by establishing this policy of not extending the range of exemptions for every class and kind of gifts the taxpayer may make encourage the elimination of the other provision upon the individual side.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In my own State, and I think in most of the States of the Union, as the gentleman is well aware, it is not legal for the directors of a corporation to use the money of the corporation for charitable purposes without some express provision in the charter. Does the gentleman think it would be well for the Government to practically ratify a violation of the law by exemption from taxes?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. That is true, perhaps, in most States. Of course if these exemptions should be allowed to the corporation, and it should distribute its profits to the individual owner or stockholder, and he should make another contribution, of course there would still be another exemption. I do not wish to detain the committee by a repetition of other reasons that have been offered in connection with this and similar proposals.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to encourage the giving of gifts and money by corporations to charitable institutions. If, as it seems to appear, judging by the remarks made by some members of this committee, to be a crime to support the Red Cross, if it is a crime to support the Y. M. C. A., why do you not pass a law and say so? Why does the Government stand back of these organizations if the people are supposed to support them? If this amendment has any merit and if there is any useful purpose in it, it is to encourage giving and supporting these charities.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KREIDER. Not now. I know that whenever a demand is made upon an organization or a corporation somebody who does not want to give hides back of the proposition and says, "We can not give; it is against the law." But it is not against the law for those people, and they do not regard it so, to spend ten times that amount in useless, worthless—well, I do not want to enumerate what I have in mind; but, gentlemen of the committee, in my judgment the generosity of the American people has not yet reached that point where it needs curbing. I do not think that we have yet been giving until it hurts, but we probably may reach that point. I believe that this amendment is a step in the right direction.

Now, the way the proposition is worked in many of the large cities is different from the smaller towns and country, and if you will pardon me I will call your attention to the fact that many men having business in the large cities live in the suburbs and are expected to give largely personally in the suburbs where they live. Their place of business is in the city, and the city as a city is always assessed and supposed to give a certain amount to these organizations. Usually those in one particular line of business are classed together, and a committee is appointed, and this committee practically lays an assessment against these corporations, and heretofore these corporations have paid these assessments, and if they did not do so they were regarded as sort of "black sheep" in their community. Pressure was brought to bear until they did pay. Now, if this Congress is going on record as putting down its foot, discouraging the giving to and supporting of these charitable organizations by corporations, it will greatly reduce the amount of the money they will be able to collect—it will give to some corporations just exactly what they want. They will say, "Here, Congress does not recognize us; they do not want us to support these organizations." And if they could have the speeches made by some men on this floor they would have them framed and put in their offices and say, "That is what they said on the floor of Congress. Go along. Congress does not want or expect us to support you, and we shall give you nothing. You are not supposed to be supported by corporations of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I do not know where the gentleman from Pennsylvania gets the idea that anybody calls giving to the Red Cross a crime. It requires a peculiar sort of reasoning and imagination to develop any such idea as that. There is not any Member of this House who has not the greatest respect and esteem for associations like the Red Cross and the Y. M. C. A. There is no Member of this House, I venture to say, but who has donated freely from his own funds to help carry on those organizations. What the members of the committee object to, what I object to, is the giving away of somebody else's money and calling it generosity. There is no generosity about that. There is nothing to be commended about that. If you donate your own funds, if you give your own money, to the Red Cross or to the Y. M. C. A., possibly there might be some credit in that, although I believe no one in these times of war and these times of stress and war, in view of the support they give to the soldiers on the field—no one would be inclined to take very much credit for giving his own money to these organizations so far as he was able to do so. But when it comes to breaking a law in order to give away some other person's money, then the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER] imagines there is a great deal of credit to be derived from that kind of a proceeding.

Mr. GORDON. He calls it wear and tear on the conscience.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; that is very well said.

This does not encourage real giving. The real patriotic movement that we want to encourage on the part of the American people is to put such heart and soul in the conflict as will cause them to use their own means instead of trying to take money from somebody else and then putting it forward in the way of generosity and patriotism.

Mr. STEENERSON. Is not this proposition based on the theory that a man who can beat the United States out of $12 tax is entitled to give $100 to charity?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is on the proposition that he needs to be encouraged to give by the thought that he can thereby beat the Government out of some sort of taxes. I do not think we have to search that far for our gifts in this country.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is not the gentleman a member of this committee?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am.

Mr. ROBBINS. Then did you not vote to allow individuals to deduct 50 per cent from the income tax?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Because they are giving of their own money.

Mr. ROBBINS. And are not stockholders and directors giving their own money?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Part of it; but also the money of other people.

Mr. ROBBINS. Do the corporations where you live give anything?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. They give $500 perhaps and take credit for giving the whole of it, when they only have anything to do with a small portion of it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I can give you the instance of a corporation that in making up the war chest in Philadelphia, following the example of hundreds of other corporations, voted to pay $1,500 a month, or $18,000 for the year, to that fund. Now, the exigency was on us to do this, and the board of directors voted it, and it secured the ratification and approval of the stockholders, and it is a gift of the corporation. And the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER] is right. A corporation ought to have just as much credit for that as an individual has for it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If they obtain the approval of their stockholders.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. They could not live in the community if they did not.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. They do not have to raise it that way.

Mr. LONGWORTH. How much more would that corporation have given if we had exempted 15 per cent of their net income?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I do not quite catch your point.

Mr. LONGWORTH. How much more would they give if we gave them 15 per cent?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I am simply justifying the equity of the situation.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will have to decline to yield further.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. May I have unanimous consent for just a moment to ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must get his time from the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. He asked me a question.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I object to this being taken out of my time.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I will not take a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, here is the situation——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] preferred a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] also made the request.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I preferred my request first, and I think as a member of the committee I am entitled to recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not hear the gentleman first. If he had he would have put the unanimous consent of the gentleman from Iowa. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] has been recognized by unanimous consent of the committee for two minutes, and is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Replying to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] and his inquiry, I would say, How much more will individuals be encouraged by exempting 15 per cent to them? My colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER] is simply asking that the same rule be applied to the corporations giving as you apply to individuals. Now, that is all there is to it. That is all there is to it. I wanted simply to make that explanation in his behalf.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, here is the situation with reference to these corporations making contributions in this way: The question ought to be asked, How much more should they give and how much would the community think they ought to give if the separate members were called upon individually to give their separate share? They give this amount collectively, and then think they are exempted from further gifts.

Mr. KREIDER. The gentleman is mistaken entirely.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not care to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield. The Chair desires to state to the Members that when a gentleman has the floor other gentlemen can not break in on him without his consent. If he declines to yield, he has the right to proceed without interruption.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not care to make any further objections to these gifts by corporations, only I say this, that the Government itself ought not to undertake to encourage the breaking of the law. Of course, there are some cases where the law permits it; in fact, a special statute was passed, as I understand, in the State of Massachusetts permitting corporations to make valuable gifts during the progress of the war. We have already authorized national banks to make such contributions to the Red Cross. But they are sufficiently compensated, or ought to be, from the fact that these gifts are going to the Red Cross or the Y. M. C. A., or these other institutions which merit their approval and support. Is it possible that we have come to the state where we ought to give a man some kind of a premium or reward, or give it to a corporation, every time he or it makes a kind of a gift to a charitable institution? I think we are going far away from the purposes of a revenue bill when we exempt institutions under such circumstances. [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

The question was taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is in doubt. Those in favor of the amendment will rise and stand until they are counted.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 19, noes 44.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 238. That in the case of a domestic corporation the total income, war-profits and excess-profits taxes imposed for the taxable year by act of Congress shall be credited with the amount of any income, war-profits and excess-profits taxes paid during the taxable year to any foreign country, Porto Rico, or the Philippine Islands upon income received from sources therein.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I have a committee amendment that I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 42, line 17, strike out the word "received" and insert in lieu thereof the word "derived."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(b) Returns shall be made to the collector of the district in which is located the principal place of business or principal office or agency of the corporation, or, if it has no principal place of business or principal office or agency in the United States, then to the collector at Baltimore, Md.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do that for the purpose of making an inquiry of the chairman of the committee in connection with these corporation returns. If I may call the attention of the chairman of the committee to page 38 of the current law, paragraph (b), section 10, he will notice that provision is made there for an additional tax of 10 per cent on undistributed earnings. Does the chairman follow me?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the gentleman must have the wrong section.

Mr. MONDELL. I am reading from the current law.

Mr. KITCHIN. You mean what is known as the Jones amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. I am reading from the print of the act approved October 3, 1917.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I recall it. It is known as the Jones amendment, relating to earnings that are carried in the surplus and not used in the business.

Mr. MONDELL. I really have in mind earnings that are used in the business. There is a 10 per cent tax on undistributed earnings, and there is this exemption:

The tax imposed by this subdivision shall not apply to that portion of the undistributed net income which is actually invested and employed in the business.

And so forth. It also exempts certain contributions. The part that I read is the part I desire to inquire about. Section 230 of this bill, on page 31, contains a provision in regard to the taxation of undistributed earnings.

But it does not contain the exemption that I have just referred to. In other words, under the new law a corporation must pay an additional tax on its undistributed earnings without being granted exemptions for—such sums as were actually invested or employed in the business or retained for employment in the reasonable requirements of the business.

What was the view of the committee in making that rather important modification?

Mr. KITCHIN. I am very sorry the gentleman was out temporarily a few minutes ago.

Mr. MONDELL. I was unavoidably out for a few moments.

Mr. KITCHIN. The committee discussed that for half an hour—that very question.

Mr. MONDELL. On my return I inquired whether that provision had been discussed. I was told it had not been. My impression had been that this exemption was carried in a later part of the bill; but after further examining it, I found that it was not.

Mr. KITCHIN. The committee was under the belief that 18 per cent on the incomes of corporations that did not have to pay any surtaxes at all was a reasonable tax. For instance, in Great Britain it is 30 per cent on all of the net income of all corporations. We made this 18 per cent. The committee saw that it had not destroyed or crippled or seriously injured any corporations in Great Britain, and we put it at just about half the amount that they pay there.

Mr. MONDELL. I am not questioning the action of the committee in the amount of the tax.

Mr. KITCHIN. We thought that 18 per cent, in order to raise the amount of revenue necessary, was not a highly unreasonable rate.

Mr. MONDELL. I think that may be true.

Mr. KITCHIN. After we decided to put on the 18 per cent rate we felt that we should offer some little inducement or stimulation to corporations to distribute some of their earnings in dividends, and we gave them a rebate of 6 per cent for that.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, may I ask the chairman if the committee took into consideration this situation: We all realize that under present conditions of constantly advancing costs of labor and material, it costs a corporation, like an individual, an increasing amount each year to carry on its business, even though its business is not enlarged; so that as a matter of fact a very considerable amount of apparent profit of a given year must necessarily be added to the business in order to carry it on in the same volume and to the same extent to which it had previously been carried on.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is true.

Mr. MONDELL. And the law last year recognized that, and did not levy an extra tax on sums so used.

Mr. GARNER. This is not an extra tax.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; it is an extra tax of 6 per cent on undistributed income.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman would not have said that if he had heard my eloquent speech.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes; I would.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman would say that if he spoke the truth.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that his time be extended three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. I realize the persuasive eloquence of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], but the language of the section is very clear and definite, and it is clearly an additional 6 per cent on undistributed incomes. I am not questioning that, but I am suggesting that the very wise provision of the present law which relieves from this additional taxation those earnings that it is necessary to carry into the business in order to keep it going should not have been omitted from the present law unless there is some very excellent reason for it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I ask the chairman of the committee [Mr. KITCHIN] whether or not the "wise provision" which the gentleman refers to in the present law—namely, the Jones amendment—is absolutely inoperative?

Mr. KITCHIN. There is no way for the Treasury Department to get the evidence whether a certain amount is reasonably required in the business or not.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, the gentleman is getting down to brass tacks; he is giving a reason or an alleged reason.

Mr. KITCHIN. And the provision is obsolete and inoperative.

Mr. MONDELL. The committee understood, from the testimony of the experts, as I now understand the chairman, that it was difficult to administer that provision, and that it was not of very great value. Is that true?

Mr. KITCHIN. Not of very great value; and the gentleman did not read all of the last provision. It adopted 10 per cent. The corporate income tax under existing law is 6 per cent. Further on in the section of the existing law to which the gentleman has called attention you will find:

If the Secretary of the Treasury shall find that an amount carried to surplus was not necessary, was not employed for business and not reasonably required for the conduct of the business, a tax of 15 per cent—

And so forth. Fifteen per cent and 6 per cent makes 21 per cent.

Mr. MONDELL. That was a penalty for retaining money with a view to escaping taxation. I am, however, still unconvinced that it was wise to strike out the provision of law to which I have referred.

Mr. KITCHIN. The committee thought this was a reasonable tax. We have discussed all this and disposed of it.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I had not intended to say anything in reference to this provision of the bill, but some of the gentlemen on the committee, in answering the question of the gentleman from Wyoming, do not put the question just as it is. This is one of the most unjust and dangerous provisions in the bill, and the most objectionable to me. I will tell you why. Every bank in this country must retain some of its undivided profits each year to take care of bad accounts, so that it may have something to charge off against bad debts without breaking into surplus or capital. Before the bank can put any of its earnings into surplus they must pay an extra 6 per cent on the money. The banks will not pay it. They will go without adding it to the surplus of the bank. It is one of the most unjust penalties on corporations imposed in this law, and I hope to see it go out. I am not going to offer any amendment, but I hope to see it go out in the Senate, and I have reasonable assurance that it will go out; and if it does I hope it will stay out.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. It seems to me that the gentleman is justified in offering an amendment and not have it go to the Senate.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, I have fought it all along from the beginning of the preparation of the bill to the present time, and have been defeated in committee all the way along. I am a Roman, and I am going to do as the Romans do—fall in line.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I have only 5 minutes.

Mr. GARNER. But the gentleman made a statement that ought not to go unchallenged; about 75 per cent of the bill has been put in there by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. ROBBINS. The gentleman said that 50 per cent was put in by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. What did other Members put in?

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman says he has been defeated all along the line, and yet 75 per cent of the bill was put in by him.

Mr. FORDNEY. I said that I had been defeated all along the line on this provision, not on all other provisions of the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to ask the gentleman from Michigan if his conception of a good soldier is to be half defeated, and expect to have the defeat turned into victory somewhere else?

Mr. FORDNEY. I reserved the right in committee to fight this provision of the bill——

Mr. KITCHIN. What the gentleman from Michigan states is true; the gentleman from Michigan has been sincere in his opposition to this provision. We were in session three months and some over, and I know that six times a day he offered it and fought for it just as he is fighting now. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentlemen did not give quite fair answers to the gentleman from Wyoming on this matter. Let me state the facts. There is not a corporation in the United States but must have twice the amount of working capital to-day that it had in normal times before the war. Now, in order to carry a surplus for working capital you are putting an extra penalty of 6 per cent on that working capital. I called the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina the other day on the floor of the House to the disadvantage that the cotton mills of the country are going to have under this provision. Let me say there are 33,430,000 spindles in the cotton mills of the United States, and the original cost of constructing a cotton mill is based on $25 per spindle. The proprietors of the cotton mills inform me, and I put the information in the RECORD, that they must now carry as working capital $25 per spindle for raw material on hand, manufactured products, and accounts, and so forth. Therefore they must carry as much working capital as the original investment in their plants.

Therefore to carry working capital of $25 per spindle for the cotton mills of this country would require more than $800,000,000, and you are imposing upon them a penalty of 6 per cent, or about $51,000,000 a year, and why?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. For the purpose of forcing the earnings of this year out of the hands of the corporation into the hands of the individual, so that the Government can get at that money and tax in order to get a few measly dollars in the United States Treasury.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. That is an imposition, a penalty, a hardship, imposed upon every corporation in the country doing business. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman agree with the chairman of the committee and the Treasury experts that a provision such as he contends for is not workable as an administrative provision? That is the excuse given.

Mr. FORDNEY. It is workable. The Treasury officials did not say that existing law is unworkable, but it is an extra penalty on every corporation. I have given you the illustration in the case of the cotton mills of the country, because I thought it might have a soothing effect upon the bosom of my good friend from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], inasmuch as that State has more cotton spindles than any other State in the Union, but he is cold and unresponsive to my suggestion, because he wants that money put into the hands of the individual in order to get a little more money in the Treasury. As he says, I have presented this matter six times a day; and if I thought I could have succeeded, I would have presented it seven times a day, and I am going to keep at it until I get that thing out of the law, because it is unbusinesslike and unreasonable.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAYMENT OF TAXES.

SEC. 250. That except as provided in sections 221 and 237 the tax shall be paid in installments, one-third of the amount of the tax shown in the return to be paid at the time fixed by law for filing the return, one-third on the fifteenth day of the second month thereafter, and the remaining one-third on the fifteenth day of the fourth month after the time fixed by law for filing the return; but where an extension of time for filing the return is granted the first installment shall be due upon the expiration of the period of such extension, and the second and third installments shall be due as above stated, except that in the case of any taxpayer who is abroad the commissioner may extend the time for payment of the second and third installments not more than four months after the expiration of the period of any extension of time for filing his return. If any installment is not paid when due, the whole amount of the tax unpaid shall become due and payable upon notice and demand by the collector.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask a question of the chairman of the committee. Does the gentleman not think that this is going to lead to complications to require a third of the tax to be paid when the return is filed. How are you going to work that out except by guesswork? How would you ascertain the third?

Mr. KITCHIN. Practically, that is exactly the way the tax is assessed now. A corporation or an individual makes his return and figures out what taxes are to be paid and the tax is paid long before the return is looked over by the Treasury Department. I do not suppose 10 per cent of the returns are tabulated and gone over before the tax is assessed and paid. Under this provision you will compute your tax as you do now, and when you send in your returns you send in one-third of the tax shown to be due.

Mr. ROBBINS. It is an estimate made by the taxpayer. He makes the estimate and takes the risk.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; you pay one-third when you make your return.

Mr. ROBBINS. The point I want to know is whether you are simply guessing at the first payment and probably at all of the rest.

Mr. KITCHIN. The payment the gentleman made himself this year was probably assessed from his return before his return was checked up.

Mr. ROBBINS. I figured it up myself and made my own statement.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman figured that up and paid that amount, and nine-tenths of the taxes were assessed and paid before the returns were tabulated and checked for errors.

The Clerk read as follows:

If any tax remains unpaid after the date when it is due and for 10 days after notice and demand by the collector, then, except in the case of estates of insane, deceased, or insolvent persons, there shall be added as part of the tax the sum of 5 per cent on the amount due but unpaid, plus interest at the rate of 1 per cent per month upon such amount from the time it became due.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, as I want to ask the gentleman from North Carolina a question. Under the present law all payments are made on or before the last day of June, and under the proposed law we are requiring payments to be made one-third at the time of filing of the statement, one-third on the 15th of May, which is about two months after, and one-third on the 15th of July, which is two months still later. The purpose of fixing periodical payments, if I understood it, was to relieve the burden which the payment of the whole tax in one installment imposes upon the taxpayer, but this is a greater burden as reported by the committee than the payment of the whole tax in one installment would be if that installment were paid as now upon the last day of June. Instead of helping the matter the committee has hurt it, according to my viewpoint.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to say to the gentleman that question was raised in the committee. It was raised when the Secretary of the Treasury was on the stand and he stated very emphatically that any other plan than the one proposed in the bill, especially one contemplating quarterly payments, would be impracticable from the administrative point of view.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, I realize that the disposition on the part of the executive branch of the Government is to gather in money before the 1st of July or as near the 1st of July as possible, but the understanding of the American people has been right along, after a determined effort was made to have payments made under existing law in installments, that when this bill was enacted into law that it would provide for installments that would mean something. Now, these installments do not mean anything to the American people at all except a system of embarrassment very much greater than the embarrassment which is imposed under the present law.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will say this plan proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury, as I understood at the time, was more for the purpose of relieving the banks from the strain of having all these payments made at one time than possibly to relieve the individual taxpayers, but at all events, as far as I am concerned—not speaking for the committee now—in approving it I was largely influenced by the fact it was an administrative matter that belonged particularly to the Treasury and the Secretary of the Treasury was very insistent upon it.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course the form of an administrative matter, I may say, depends entirely upon what authority we give to the administrative officer who administers the law. Now, from my conversations with the business people of the United States, I can not help reaching the conclusion this is going to be a great hardship upon them. A provision of this kind which requires one-third of the taxes to be remitted with the statement presupposes that all men who pay taxes have large bank balances, whereas the truth of the matter is that most of the men who pay large taxes have to borrow the money with which to pay them and are not prepared to send a check when they send the statement. My own thought is that we ought to be as liberal as we possibly can be without embarrassing the Treasury Department, but I apprehend that the American public in anticipation of the enactment of this law has reached the conclusion from statements made through the public press that some relief was going to be granted to them which this bill does not grant, and I hope that the Committee on Ways and Means will find itself not only willing but able to assist in an amendment to this section of the bill in such form as will grant that relief which the people of the country expect.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. For State taxation the 1st of April prevails in Illinois?

Mr. MADDEN. No; the 1st of May is the last day, the last day of April.

Mr. CANNON. The 1st day of April down State.

Mr. MADDEN. In the country I think that is true; with us it is different.

Mr. CANNON. If a man has got the money to pay it he had better pay it when he makes his return, otherwise when the 1st of April comes, if he only makes a payment of one-third of it, why State taxation in our State is pretty heavy——

Mr. MADDEN. I know; 30 per cent of your income.

Mr. CANNON. About 7 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask just about two minutes more if I may have it; I do not want to impose myself on the time of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GILLETT. As I understand it, the response of the committee is that they have made this change in payment not at all to help the people, as the gentleman supposed and as I supposed they would have done, but simply to help the administration of the banks.

Mr. MADDEN. And the Treasury.

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. It seems to me the people who pay the taxes ought to be taken into account. Consideration ought not to be given to the Secretary of the Treasury and the method of his administration of a certain function ought not to be given to the Secretary of the Treasury or the banks.

Now, for example, as my colleague [Mr. CANNON] says, this bill provides that on the 15th of March you will be required to pay one-third of your tax. On the 1st of April, outside of Chicago and Cook County, throughout the State of Illinois, all taxes are payable. Otherwise, there is 1 per cent penalty levied.

Mr. CANNON. All assessable for the coming year.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. That means 30 per cent of your income. The average tax levy for a State, county, municipal, and school purposes in our State, takes away 30 per cent of a man's income. That is to be paid regardless of the national tax. When you come to the 15th of May under this bill you are called upon to pay one-third more of the tax. In our State we have special assessments levied for certain local matters, some of which are payable in June, and when we come to pay these in June, and then add the other tax on the 15th of July, you see you have got to wear a hole in the sidewalk between your office and the bank to see whether or not you can get the money with which to meet the obligation. Let us take the people into consideration. Let us take them into our confidence and give them to understand that we speak for them once in a while and that the administrative officers of the Government are not the only people connected with America. Do the thing the people of the United States will thank you for once in a while instead of condemning you for. This bill does not meet the honest, decent, or righteous expectations of the people who are going to pay these taxes with respect to the periods when the payments must be made.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words to ask the gentleman a question.

In line 10, page 47, after the word "insane," why should not the word "minors" be included? That paragraph is a penal one. It imposes a penalty on those who are in legal duress. Why did you not include minors?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say that the guardians make the returns for the minors. The minors will not be expected to do that. This has been the existing law all the time—in 1915, 1916, and 1917.

Mr. ROBBINS. Still, that does not answer the question.

Mr. KITCHIN. A minor can not give that in.

Mr. ROBBINS. Neither can an insane person or a deceased person. In the case of insane persons it is made by a committee, and in the case of deceased persons by the administrator.

Mr. KITCHIN. There is no penalty here.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is what I say. It excepts insane persons, because the committee must make the return, and it excepts deceased persons, because the administrators must make return, but it does not except minors, for whom the guardian must make the return.

Mr. KITCHIN. It should not. The guardian should be compelled to make return for his ward as much as a receiver should make return for an estate.

Mr. ROBBINS. If he does not do it, why should he not be on the same plane as the committee for the insane person is? They are both creatures of the court. If for some oversight the return is not made, why should not the guardians, who are sui juris and are not under duress, be made to make a return?

Mr. KITCHIN. It is just exactly like this now. It does not change the present law. A minor has never been penalized under that.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE III.—WAR-PROFITS AND EXCESS-PROFITS TAX.

PART I.—GENERAL DEFINITIONS.

SEC. 300. That when used in this title the terms "taxable year," "fiscal year," and "dividends" shall have the same meaning as provided for the purposes of income tax in section 200. The first taxable year for the purposes of this title shall be the same as the first taxable year for the purposes of the income tax under Title II.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho makes the same request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH. What are these remarks about?

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. To express my personal appreciation of a Member of the last Congress, the late William Crittenden Mooney, a Representative from the fifteenth Ohio district.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make a request to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH. What about?

Mr. HAWLEY. Remarks made on the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the committee do now rise. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DRANE, for the day, on account of important business; and

To Mr. LA FOLLETTE, indefinitely, on account of the serious illness of his mother.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 8004. An act authorizing the resurvey or retracement of lands heretofore returned as surveyed public lands of the United States under certain conditions; and

H. R. 12098. An act to protect the lives and health and morals of women and minor workers in the District of Columbia, and to establish a minimum-wage board and define its powers and duties, and to provide for the fixing of minimum wages for such workers, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, September 18, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting draft of bill to provide for the prompt settlement of debts of deceased members of our expeditionary forces abroad (H. Doc. No. 1281); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting supplemental estimates of appropriation required by the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1282); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. BURNETT, from the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 331) authorizing the readmission to the United States of certain aliens who have been conscripted or have volunteered for service with the military forces of the United States or cobelligerent forces, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 783), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII,

Mr. GANDY introduced a bill (H. R. 12960) for the relief of Frank Walsh, Fred F. Fuller, and Otto F. Schroeder, which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. BROWNING: Memorial of the Philadelphia and New Jersey Conference, Methodist Episcopal preachers' meeting, adopted on September 9, 1918, petitioning the Congress that plans be consummated whereby ministers of the gospel shall not be exempted from service under the selective-service law; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH: Memorial of T. C. Flick and 14 other druggists of East Liverpool, Ohio, and Chester and Newell, W. Va., protesting against any change in the Harrison narcotic law; also memorial of Flot & Schafer, of Steubenville, Ohio, protesting against taxation of high-grade shoes as luxuries; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. LINTHICUM: Petition of James H. Preston, mayor of Baltimore, Md., against the proposed tax on State and municipal bonds; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. PRATT: Resolution adopted at a public meeting held at Bradford, N. Y., relative to polygamy, signed by E. C. Van Keuren and W. M. De Witt; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition, protesting against any additional tax upon nonbeverage alcohol used as raw material in the manufacture of commodities already subject to the sale tax, by the druggists and pharmacists of Hornell, N. Y., signed by A. S. Van Winkle, George Hollands & Sons, Hornell Drug Co., Horace G. Pierson, Young Pharmacy, E. D. S. Robison, H. D. Walters, and C. V. Hawley; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SNOOK: Petition of H. L. Good and others protesting against the increase of revenue taxes on automobiles; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, September 18, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, as Thou dost read the secrets of our hearts Thou dost know that we desire to hold our place with honor among the nations of the earth. We seek from Thee the virtues and the graces of statesmanship. We pray Thee to give to us an unyielding purpose with high ideals and divine aspirations that we may serve faithfully and well our fellow men and our God in the present crisis. Grant us that will to do God's will, that we may not compromise in the face of danger for any purpose or reason the great principles upon which we have founded a government of the people, for the people, by the people. Help us to this end this day in our work. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ATLANTIC INTRACOASTAL CANALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting, in response to a resolution of July 5, 1918, a report on the commercial, military, and other advantages of deep sea-level canals connecting Massachusetts Bay and Buzzards Bay, New York Bay and Delaware River, and Delaware River and Chesapeake Bay, with particular reference to their ownership and operation by the Government of the United States, which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House disagrees to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11259) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FOSTER, Mr. TAYLOR of Corolado, and Mr. GARLAND managers at the conference on the part of the House.

SUSQUEHANNA RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 4871) to authorize the Philadelphia, Harrisburg & Pittsburgh Railroad Co., its lessees, successors, and assigns, to construct a bridge across the Susquehanna River, from the city of Harrisburg, Dauphin County, Pa., to the borough of Lemoyne, Cumberland County, Pa., and I submit a report (No. 572) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 4932) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war; to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war; and to supervise the issuance of securities, and for other purposes," approved April 5, 1918; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. STERLING:

A bill (S. 4933) granting a pension to Lucy A. Schriver (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 4934) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth Forrest (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 4935) granting an increase of pension to Susan Owens (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 4936) granting an increase of pension to Frank J. McLaughlin (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 4937) granting an increase of pension to Silas J. Warford (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 4938) granting an increase of pension to Robert S. Clark (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 4939) granting an increase of pension to Lizzie Noland (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 4940) granting a pension to Sureno Doll (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 4941) granting a pension to Julia McKim (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 4942) granting an increase of pension to Henry W. Botsford (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 4943) granting a pension to Jesse W. Bowdle; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 4944) to permit free entry into the United States of all material and articles imported for the use and by order of the War Department or the Navy Department during the existing war, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

A bill (S. 4945) to amend an act entitled "An act to give indemnity for damages caused by American forces abroad," approved April 18, 1918; and

A bill (S. 4946) to permit organizations, units, and detachments of the military forces to sell kitchen by-products, waste, and garbage from their messes, and to permit the Government to be the purchaser thereof; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THE REVENUE.

Mr. RANSDELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

Mr. OWEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

INSURANCE OF COAL SUPPLY.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I introduce a bill and ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. After it has been read by its title, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few minutes in which to speak a few words in explanation of it.

The bill (S. 4931) to insure a supply of coal for munition works, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I wish to bring briefly at this time to the attention of the Senate the importance of this measure. It is a bill which is designed to aid in preventing a shortage of the coal supply of the country during the coming winter, not only for domestic consumption but for munition plants and for other war industries and activities. It is a vitally important matter.

I have a short clipping from the Washington Post of the 15th instant relating to the subject, which I will read:

> A shortage of 17,000,000 net tons of industrial coal for the coal year to date is the situation that confronts the American people, it was learned last night, with no probable relief from any other source besides economy.
> The daily average required for the rest of the coal year, from now till March 31, 1919, to make up the deficit is 2,041,000 net tons. Some encouragement is seen by the Fuel Administration, however, in the speeding up by the miners that resulted in producing 11,249,000 net tons for the week ending September 7, including the lay off on Labor Day, averaging a daily production of 2,110,000 net tons, which is more than the future daily average required.
> The anthracite production for the week is estimated at 1,617,579 net tons, which is 3 per cent less than the corresponding week of last year.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. MYERS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. KELLOGG. I understand the bill introduced by the Senator is one to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the vicinity of coal mines.

Mr. MYERS. It is a bill to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors within 5 miles of any coal mine for 60 days after the 1st day of October, 1918, which I think would be a great help.

Mr. KELLOGG. The President has the power to-day to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors within that radius of coal mines. I think the joint resolution passed by Congress a few weeks ago grants the President that power.

Mr. MYERS. It grants to the President the power, in his discretion, to make such orders. It says he may make such an order and may at any time establish zones of such size as he may deem advisable about coal mines, munition factories, shipbuilding plants, and other war plants, in which the sale of intoxicating liquor may be prohibited. This bill applies to coal mines only, and is intended to meet an emergency. It would absolutely prohibit by law the sale of liquor within 5 miles of any coal mine for a period of 60 days from the 1st of October, 1918. After that period of time, it would have no application. That is the difference.

I have a letter from Prof. Irving Fisher, of Yale University, on the subject. It is short and I will read it:

> YALE UNIVERSITY,
> September 16, 1918.
> Senator HENRY L. MYERS,
> MY DEAR SENATOR MYERS: I have just learned of your intention to introduce an emergency bill closing saloons around coal mines, and want to say that, in view of the serious situation ahead for New England in respect to coal, I believe this bill should be of special importance for this section of the country.
> If more people realized both the coal scarcity and the part which liquor plays in aggravating that scarcity, there would be almost universal support of such a bill from Connecticut and New England.
> Wishing you all success, I am
> Very sincerely yours, IRVING FISHER.

I will say in addition, Mr. President, that the country is to-day confronted with the prospect of an absolute shortage of coal during the coming winter for domestic consumption and for munition plants and other war activities and industries. This bill absolutely prohibits by law the sale of liquor within 5 miles of a coal mine for 60 days from the 1st of October, 1918, and I think, if enacted, would materially help in overcoming the threatened shortage of which I am informed there is ample documentary proof, which I would be glad at any time to submit to the Judiciary Committee or to the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the Senator if this proof has not been submitted to the Fuel Administration and to the President?

Mr. MYERS. I could not say. It may have been.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think it ought to be. Of course, I am in hearty sympathy with the proposal of the Senator. I think Congress really ought by legislation to prohibit it, but we have not seen fit to do that. We have left it to the discretion of the President. I think the Senator would be serving a good purpose to bring this documentary proof to the attention of the President and the Fuel Administration and be sure that they have it, because action ought to be taken either by the legislative body or by the executive department.

Mr. MYERS. I have been furnished with this information by other parties and they have assured me that they are able to furnish documentary proof, and doubtless they have laid it, or will lay it, before the President and the Fuel Administration. The danger appears, from representations to me, to be imminent, and the President has so many things resting upon him and vested in his discretion that I think Congress ought to be willing in some instances to assume responsibility and act directly. I think this is one of them.

GERMAN SUBMARINE WARFARE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). The morning business is closed.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I gave notice yesterday that I would address the Senate briefly this morning on the German submarine warfare. I desire to give notice that on next Tuesday, September 24, following the morning hour, I will speak more at length on matters pertaining to my recent visit to the war zone if the parliamentary situation at that time will permit. I shall confine my remarks this morning principally to the submarine question.

A few days ago there appeared in the press the following statement of Admiral von Scheer, chief of the German Admiralty staff:

> You may say to the country with a good conscience that I do not doubt for a moment we shall bring England to her knees by submarine warfare. Only I do not bind myself to a definite date.

On my recent visit to the war zone I had occasion to give some study to submarine warfare, and I am glad to be able to state from knowledge I have received from those who are acquainted with the exact facts that there is nothing to alarm the country in this boast of the German admiral. This cry is simply like the proverbial drowning man reaching for a straw. It is the last effort to alarm the country over the submarine. One of the best items of information I am able to bring home to the people of this country is the fact that the intended object of the submarine warfare has proved a failure. I think I can also safely say that the submarine is no longer a serious menace to transportation across the seas. It is, of course, an annoyance and a great hindrance, and as long as there is a single submarine in the waters of the sea every effort must be made by the allied powers to destroy it, for it is an outlaw and must not exist. The truth is that Germany never had more than 320 submarines all told, including all construction before and since the war.

We have positive knowledge of the destruction of more than one-half of these submarines, and we also know that it is practically impossible for Germany to keep in operation more than 10 per cent of those remaining. It is therefore reduced to a negligible quantity so far as its ultimate effect upon the result of the war is concerned. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], after his recent unfortunate experience, may not agree with me in this; but I feel I owe it to the mothers and fathers of the country, whose boys are daily going upon the transports and crossing the seas, to tell them the exact facts. It will be observed that the transportation of troops and supplies goes on just as vigorously and almost as uninterruptedly as if the submarine did not exist. I saw a reliable statement in France to the effect that there is one ship of some character leaving the eastern shores of America for the war zone every six minutes, and it is only a few vessels which are ever torpedoed, estimated at about 1 per cent. This is less than the loss by storm and accident in the earlier days of transportation and is not much greater than such loss now. We must bear in mind that we read only of the ships which have been torpedoed and see but little account of the hundreds of ships which pass over the ocean safely and undisturbed. Three hundred thousand soldiers are conveyed across the Atlantic every 30 days, and an average of about 500,000 tons of freight carried to the French coast. There are warehouses in only one of the many ports of France with a capacity of over 2,000,000 tons.

It is to the Navy that this credit for the destruction of this outlaw seagoing craft is due. The Navy is and has been the backbone of this war, the same as it has been of almost every great war in history. Without the allied navy the submarine would have perhaps accomplished its nefarious purpose in starving the European allies and in preventing them from securing the necessary munitions of war to defend themselves. It has utterly failed in this respect. The allies are amply supplied with food, and there are provisions enough on hand now, if every ship should be sunk, to last the allies and armies for months. The destroyer is the ship which has brought Germany to her knees in submarine warfare and will keep her there. We have not enough destroyers, and it is for this reason we are obliged in this great transportation problem to run risks which would not be taken under ordinary conditions. If every ship was escorted by a sufficient number of destroyers I doubt if there would be a single ship of any consequence sunk, except by the merest accident. It will be observed, however, that there has not been a single American transport, loaded with soldiers conducted by American crews and convoyed by an American escort, which has been sunk since the commencement of the war. All successful attacks on American ships have been made on their return trips when the boats were empty and are usually escorted through necessity by a less number of destroyers. Due credit should be given to the American Navy for this wonderful record. Too much can not be said of the good work of the Navy—that branch of the service which says so little and does so much.

It is pleasing to know that even across the English Channel ships are now operating with about the same ease and security as before the war. It may be interesting to know just how carefully ships are guarded on their trips across the sea and the extra precautions which are taken against the submarines. There were 12 large transports in the convoy of ships with which I sailed to France, carrying about 40,000 American troops, which were escorted, in addition to the assistance of airplanes and dirigible balloons, commonly called "sausages" on account of their shape, which operate close to shore in the danger zone on each side, by a cruiser and destroyers until we got within the danger zone on the other side of the water, where we were met away out in the sea, in the darkness of night and in a dense fog, by many additional American destroyers, which were mighty welcome after the long voyage. The colored soldiers, who usually see the humorous side of things, dubbed them "the little Fords" as they came floating up, dancing, as they said, a "two-step" upon the waves. At night all portholes were closed, and no light of any kind was permitted to show on deck, not even a lighted cigar. Dim lights were permitted in the rooms, but all outside portholes, windows, and doors were kept securely closed, and no one was allowed to remain on deck. There were about 100 lookouts, with two men in each, on the ship on which I sailed, making at least 400 eyes from this one ship upon the water in all directions at all times. These men are all connected by telephone to the bridge deck, and the moment anything is sighted it is communicated to the officer on deck, who directs the gunners. Everything is reported, no matter how small, including birds, fish, porpoise, whale, bottles, boards, boxes, barrels, newspapers, weeds, or trash of any kind. An order is given to each lookout to remember that there is nothing too small or insignificant to report. I was struck with the instructions to the lifeboat crew, prepared by the commander, who, I am proud to say, is a Kansan, Lieut. Commander Charles Clifford Gill, who has written a very interesting and instructive book on the subject of "Naval power in the war," which is now used as a textbook in the Naval Academy at Annapolis. These instructions read as follows:

Frequent inspections of boats do not give good results unless these inspections are thorough, and every fault found, whatever may be its nature or however small or unimportant it may appear, is rectified at once.

Men should be instructed to perform all duties in connection with lowering and handling boats. This can only be accomplished by frequent drill and instruction by officers qualified to perform this duty. All hands must be taught to show initiative in performing their duties to passengers and in adopting prescribed procedure to meet unforeseen contingencies.

There are lifeboats and rafts for all passengers, each lifeboat being commanded by a competent crew of sailors and naval officers, and, in addition to the crew, each boat holds 36 passengers and is equipped for sailing, and carries a supply of provisions. Life preservers are provided for each passenger and all others on board, and what is termed "abandon ship drill" is had on each boat at least once every day and sometimes unexpectedly in the night. In the danger zones all passengers are ordered to put on their life belts and to keep them on. The colored troops also saw the funny side of this performance, and in their humorous way called the life preservers "droundin' jackets" and referred to the drill as the "droundin' drill." On our way over we had three engagements with supposed submarines. One of the objects turned out to be a floating target, but it was never determined what the other objects fired upon actually were, but it is not probable that they were submarines. There are over 3,000 reports of destruction of submarines, when there were only about 300 in existence. But the naval officers take no chances. They always shoot at everything in the water that looks suspicious or dangerous. Even the whales suffer by reason of their peculiar method of traveling in the water, their back fin when a distance away having the appearance of a periscope and leaving a ripple on the water in their path exactly like that made by a periscope. The submarine commanders are afraid of the armed ships, for they know that if ever their periscopes are seen by an American gunner it is "all off" with them. They are also deathly afraid of the American destroyers, who go right straight after them the moment they are sighted, and if the submarine submerges the destroyers drop the terrible depth bombs down upon them, which destroy everything within a radius of several hundred feet.

After witnessing the good effects of arming the ships, one wonders at the action of the Senate of the United States, as late as March, 1916, when it refused to give the President authority to arm these ships in self-defense. It would have been a good thing for the country if some of those who opposed armed neutrality should have been required to make a trip abroad just before that action was taken. It would certainly have given them the necessary light on the subject.

Arming the ships has changed the mode of submarine warfare by requiring the submarine to stay under water and to fire its torpedo from under the water. The submarine is now required to get the location, speed, and direction of a ship it attacks for a distance of from 8 to 10 miles, where its periscope can not be seen. It dare not come to the surface within sight of any armed ship. The submarine commander at that distance away estimates the proper time to launch a torpedo to reach the point the ship will pass, continuing in the same direction at the same rate of speed, and then submerges and proceeds under water without even daring to show its periscope, and when within launching distance of the ship's path, ordinarily about half a mile, fires the torpedo under water, which usually hits its mark unless the ship attacked has in the interim changed its speed or course. Hence the necessity for zigzagging and changing the speed, the common method now employed by all ships to avoid this distant hidden submarine which lies in wait for its prey. People often wonder why, with so many armed ships and destroyers around, a submarine, after a successful attack, is permitted to escape. The reason is that the submarine, sighting the ship miles away, where its periscope can not be seen, and then proceeding under water and staying under water when it discharges its torpedo, and then immediately going in the opposite direction under water, can seldom be discovered.

Of course, if a ship runs into one, or if a submarine puts up its periscope within a distance to be seen by the eye or a field glass, it is fired upon or rammed by the large ship itself or a destroyer, and it is usually sunk. The Olympic, the ship on which I returned, recently rammed and destroyed a submarine and rescued most of its crew. Every possible precaution should be taken to prevent any further destruction of ships by the murderous submarine. German prisoners, officers in particular, placed in the empty ships on their return trips, and Germany so advised, might help materially to protect them in their passage. A few hundred more destroyers and submarine chasers, which are now in the process of construction, will do the business, and it will be Germany that is brought to her knees instead of England.

It was my good fortune to see the Grand Fleet, which is generally understood to be in the vicinity of the North Sea. This was formerly called the Royal Fleet, but since the entrance of the United States into the war and the joining of our Navy with this fleet the name has been changed to the Grand Fleet, and it is certainly worthy of its name, for it is conceded by all to be the greatest and most powerful fleet ever brought together under one command. Sailing in single file, without counting the numerous destroyers, submarines, submarine chasers, and other smaller craft, it is said to be about 80 miles in length and requires hours, going at ordinary speed, to pass in review. With such a fleet no one ever need worry about the German Navy coming out of its hiding place and doing any very great damage.

There is perfect harmony between the British and the American officers in this command. Admiral Beatty, of the British Navy, is, of course, supreme in command, but it frequently devolves upon our American Admiral Rodman to command, and whenever orders are given by either commander they are obeyed and respected as if of equal authority. Admiral Rodman is one of the resourceful and practical men of the Navy, so much admired by the people of this country. When I left him at the Grand Fleet on August 29 I asked if there was any message I could take for him to the Secretary of the Navy or if there was anything we could do for him in Congress, and he replied, "Not a thing. Tell the Secretary we have everything we need over here and that everything is running perfectly smooth, and for God's sake let us alone." With such a spirit we need have no fear that our Navy is not in safe hands, for like the command of Admiral Dewey, even with the cables cut, whenever a fight comes, which all of our men and officers are itching for, victory will sure be on our side.

VALUATION OF RAILROADS.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to have read and inserted in the RECORD the very brief editorial, which I send to the desk, relating to a matter as to which a bill was introduced some time ago. It seems to me that this is an opportune time for the Committee on Interstate Commerce to consider the matter referred to in this editorial.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Utah, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASTE OF MEN AND MONEY.

Attention has been directed to the fact that Congress has not yet repealed the useless and costly law which keeps hundreds of expert men at work trying to make a valuation of the railroads. The work costs millions of dollars, it is worthless even before it is finished, and it will never be finished. At this time, when expert accountants and railroad operators are badly needed, it would seem that immediate suspension of the valuation act, if not its repeal, would be demanded by the Government itself.

No argument is needed to show that the valuation work is useless. The Government has taken over the railroads. A new system of evaluation has been worked out already. The sums of money originally spent upon the railroads or their actual physical valuation on the basis of what it would cost to reproduce them are matters of no consequence. In the first case time has changed conditions, and in the second case time will have changed conditions again before the Government and the railroads could agree upon any valuations based upon cost of reproduction. The cost of reproduction in 1914 and the cost of reproduction now, for example, are as different as day and night. What will be the cost of reproduction of the railroads in 1920 or whenever the war is over? No human being can guess.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should be very glad if the Committee on Interstate Commerce would take up the bill, which is pending in that committee, for the abolition of this useless body. I think the editorial which has just been read very strongly sets forth the reasons for some affirmative action.

BOND EXEMPTION.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12923) to supplement the second liberty-bond act, as amended, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, unanimous consent having been given for the consideration of the bill, as asked for by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Henderson	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Smith, S. C.
Beckham	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Sterling
Brandegee	Kellogg	Overman	Thomas
Culberson	Kendrick	Phelan	Thompson
Cummins	King	Poindexter	Townsend
Curtis	Kirby	Pomerene	Trammell
Dillingham	Knox	Reed	Underwood
Drew	Lodge	Robinson	Vardaman
Fall	McCumber	Shafroth	Walsh
France	McKellar	Sheppard	Warren
Gore	McNary	Shields	Wilfley
Guion	Martin, Ky.	Simmons	Williams
Hale	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.
Harding	Myers	Smith, Ga.

Mr. KING. I wish to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] are detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The Secretary will read the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina asks that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? There being none, the bill will be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be disposed of first.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not know whether I am expected to make a statement with respect to the purposes of this bill and the manner of accomplishing those purposes; but I am inclined to think that by making such a statement probably time will be conserved. In doing this I think it will be more helpful to an understanding of the bill to take it up section by section.

The first section of the bill is a general provision exempting from certain taxes the income upon not to exceed $30,000 of so-called fourth liberty bonds when owned by any person, partnership, association, or corporation. The present law exempts all of these bonds from normal income taxes. The present law exempts the first issue of liberty bonds not only from normal taxes, but from surtaxes, excess-profits taxes, and all other taxes except estate or inheritance taxes. The bonds of the second and the third and the fourth issues are subject, however, to surtaxes and excess-profits taxes as well as inheritance taxes.

The purpose of the first section is to exempt from taxation the income from as much as $80,000 of all of these bonds—not only those of the first liberty loan, converted, but those of the other three liberty loans. The second paragraph of this section somewhat enlarges the exemption allowed in the first paragraph to which I have just alluded. This paragraph provides that a taxpayer, whether an individual, corporation, or copartnership, who has subscribed to the bonds that are to be presently sold to any amount not exceeding $30,000, but who has in his ownership on the date of his tax return bonds of the first converted, second, or third liberty loans may be allowed, in addition to the exemption as to the $30,000 of the fourth loan, an exemption equal to one and one-half times the amount of bonds originally subscribed for and held by him of the fourth issue, provided that the amount does not exceed $45,000.

It will be manifest, Mr. President, that under these circumstances it is possible that one person or corporation or association may secure, through the operation of this act, exemption from taxation to the extent of $75,000. In addition to that, of course, he will have the exemption of $5,000 which is now allowed by law; so that $80,000 is the largest amount for which, under any circumstances, one person or association could claim exemption under paragraphs 1 and 2 of section 1 of this act.

It is important, I think, to impress upon the Senate that there should be no confusion with reference to the exemption. It is not an exemption of $30,000 or $80,000; it is merely an exemption of the interest or the income from that amount of bonds. If the holder of bonds of the first converted, second, or third issue does not subscribe to and become the owner of bonds of the fourth issue he would not be entitled to the benefit of any exemption with reference to these bonds. The third subdivision of section 1 provides that the holder of bonds of the first issue, who has not converted them into those of the second issue or the third, but who converts into the fourth, shall be entitled to the benefit of the exemption up to the interest upon $30,000 of such converted bonds.

That is all that the bill provides with reference to the bonds.

Section 2 of the bill provides for an increase in the amount of war-savings stamps that may be sold by the Secretary of the Treasury from $2,000,000 to $4,000,000. I think it is well known that these stamps have proved very popular, and their sale has been found an excellent means of inducing men of very small means to come to the relief of the Government in the matter of finance. That section also provides that the original provision with reference to war-savings stamps, which limited to a thousand dollars the amount of these stamps that might be held or owned by any one person, shall be amended so as to provide that the limit of a thousand dollars shall apply only to one series—these stamps being issued in series—thus making it possible for any citizen of the country to purchase as much as $1,000 of each series that may be issued. Section 2 also strikes out the provision of the second liberty-loan act the provision that no person shall be permitted to buy more than $100 worth of these stamps at any time. This allows the purchase of the whole $1,000 worth or any lesser amount at any one time.

The third section simply extends to war-profits taxes the provisions of section 8 of the second liberty-bond act. Senators will recall that the third liberty-loan act is an amendment of the second. The second liberty-loan act uses the term "excess-profits taxes." That covered the taxes that we had then levied. The revenue bill now pending in the House provides for a different method of taxation, known as war-profits taxes, and this section simply extends the exemption to war-profits taxes as well as excess-profits taxes.

The fourth section of the bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury during the war and for two years after its termination to acquire foreign currencies and credits, and to designate depositories in foreign countries of these credits and these currencies, so as to enable him to adjust, regulate, and stabilize matters of foreign exchange.

Under the present law, while the Secretary of the Treasury may sell bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the United States in foreign countries, he is not permitted to deposit the proceeds of those bonds in the banks of foreign countries. He has no authority to establish Government depositories in foreign countries. He has no authority, under the law, to transfer funds from the Treasury of the United States to a depository in a foreign country. These conditions have made it exceedingly difficult for the Treasury Department to do anything to stabilize the unsettled foreign exchange situation. It is felt by the Secretary that if he is permitted to acquire foreign currency and deposit it in foreign banks the difficulties which we are now having by reason of the uncertainty of exchange values will measurably disappear.

Mr. OWEN and Mr. KING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield first to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to say to the Senator I introduced an amendment to the revenue bill covering that exact point, because an examination of the matter makes it perfectly clear that the Secretary of the Treasury must have this authority if we are to be able to put the dollar at par in the neutral countries where we are making purchases.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator is entirely right about it. I think that is a very valuable provision of the bill. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have received a number of communications recently from American business houses engaged in commercial enterprises in the Latin American Republics, principally Venezuela and British Colombia and Peru, and there has been some considerable complaint in regard to the exchange and the great loss which the Americans sustain by reason of the lack of stability of exchange. Does the Senator think that this measure will relieve in part some of the difficulties which are now being experienced by those engaged in commercial activities in South America?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the opinion of the Treasury Department.

Mr. LODGE. That is the purpose.

Mr. SIMMONS. And your committee entirely concurs in that opinion.

Mr. KING. The point I had in mind was whether this measure, when enacted, will enable the Secretary of the Treasury to accomplish all that is desired in that respect.

Mr. SIMMONS. It seems to me to be about as far as we can go with reference to foreign currencies.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to observe that under the present circumstances, where the United States is furnishing the credit by which to stabilize foreign exchange in New York at 4.76⅞, the present rate, the effect is that the purchases made by Great Britain and by France become, in effect, liabilities of the United States in relation to international exchange. The consequence is that the United States is bearing that burden, and the only way in which it can be obviated is by placing the credit of the United States with nations which are now creditor nations of the United States through this process; and that will be covered by the proposal which is in the revenue bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I might add that the present situation with reference to Spain is one that appeals for a remedy of some sort. We are buying very extensively from Spain to supply requirements of our Army and our Navy abroad, and it is very necessary that we should be able to settle those obligations in the currency of that country. That will be accomplished if the Secretary of the Treasury is permitted to buy the currency of that country and deposit it to the credit of the United States in the banks of Spain.

Mr. OWEN. The balance of trade in favor of the United States with Spain was $55,000,000, but the international balance in favor of Spain was $125,000,000. So when we had this credit of $55,000,000 absorbed through the stabilization it left Spain an international credit on a large scale. Those funds are pouring into the banks of Spain and they are in a peculiarly advantageous position to extend credit out of those funds pouring in in lieu of commodities. So since we can not adjust it by commodity shipments the only way is by credit arrangements, and the banks of Spain, with the support of the Spanish Government, will, I am informed, be willing to adjust this matter so that these credits may be extended against our purchases.

Mr. SIMMONS. The only other section in the bill——

Mr. REED. Before the Senator goes to that I should like to call his attention to paragraph 2 of section 1, if I do not disturb the course of his remarks.

Mr. SIMMONS. Not at all.

Mr. REED. As I understand paragraph 2 of section 1 it does not propose to exempt bonds from taxation in any amount unless the owner of the bonds shall subscribe to the new liberty loan.

Mr. SIMMONS. I explained that.

Mr. REED. And he escapes taxation in proportion to his ability to subscribe to the new liberty loan, with a limit that he can not get an exemption beyond $45,000. One of the objects, I suppose, of the committee is to bring the bonds back to par.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is an object.

Mr. REED. Is it the object of the committee to fix this thing so that only the men who are wealthy can get the advantage of having their bonds exempted? That was not any part of the purpose of the committee?

Mr. SIMMONS. No.

Mr. REED. Of course it was not. Now, let us take this sort of a case: A man who when the second liberty loan was offered, feeling and believing that his Government needed the money, put his entire fortune into liberty bonds. Although he might have invested his money at more lucrative rates, he came forward with all he had. Therefore he has not the money to put into the fourth liberty loan. Do you think that that man ought to be discriminated against in favor of some individual who subscribed stingily to the second liberty loan out of his great fortune and who is able now to gain an exemption upon the bonds which he heretofore took? I have asked the question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think there were clearly two objects in view. The first object in view was to make these bonds of the fourth liberty loan as attractive to the purchasers as possible with a view to inducing the people to buy.

Mr. REED. Attractive to some parties? Attractive only to the wealthy, or attractive to everybody?

Mr. SIMMONS. Attractive to everybody. The purpose was to make them attractive. Now, two methods of making them attractive were devised and provided for in the bill: First, he is given an exemption from all Federal taxes except inheritance taxes on the interest upon an amount that he subscribes for, not exceeding $30,000, of the fourth loan. That obviously will furnish quite an inducement for the purchase of these bonds.

As an additional inducement to the purchase of these bonds it is provided that if the purchaser shall invest his money in these bonds to any extent not exceeding $30,000 and happens to be the owner of bonds of either of the other three issues he is given a like exemption to an amount not exceeding one and one-half times the amount actually subscribed for and owned in the present loan. That furnishes a double inducement. The very poor man of whom the Senator has spoken already has an exemption——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wish the Senator would speak a little louder. We are all interested in what he is saying, and we can not hear a word on this side.

Mr. SIMMONS. I say the small man to whom the Senator from Missouri has referred already has an exemption from all taxes except inheritance taxes on $5,000.

Mr. REED. Everybody has that, small and big.

Mr. SIMMONS. Everybody has it to the extent of $5,000. Now, the small man will be entitled to an additional exemption to the extent of his ability to further invest. But it is not only to the small man we desire to sell these bonds. We desire to sell them to everybody, the big man and the small man alike. But it has been thought not wise to extend the exemption to all the bonds, and arbitrarily the department has suggested $30,000 as the proper limit. The small man who has his exemption upon $5,000, if he is not able to buy more than $5,000, ought not to complain if the man a step above him who can buy $10,000 is given the same exemption.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; he ought to complain.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not see it in that light. He has not only got his $5,000, but if he is able to invest any more he gets the same exemption as the man of larger means up to $30,000.

Mr. REED. The difficulty of the situation is twofold, and it is perfectly plain. Take two bonds identical in amount, each for a thousand dollars, issued by the Government; one of them owned by A is taxed and one of them owned by B is not taxed, because B has enough money to buy an additional bond. A must pay his taxes upon his bond because he has not enough money to buy another bond. B escapes paying taxes upon his bond because he is able to buy another bond.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator now is speaking of bonds of the first, second, and third issues?

Mr. REED. Yes; I am taking an illustration. I will abandon the illustration that I used and take another. A and B bought the second liberty loan 4 per cent bonds. A had $40,000 in cash, and he put it all in bonds. All that he had in the world he put in the bonds, because he was patriotic and willing to contribute. B bought $20,000 of the bonds and held back $20,000. B can now come in and buy $20,000 of bonds and have an exemption on the $20,000 that he purchased, but A, having put in all his money in the first instance, can not get any exemption, because he has not any money with which to buy any more bonds. I say that it is not fair; it is not just. It is the old principle, "to him who hath shall be given," which has never been a good maxim in morals or in law. Now, that ought not to be.

Now, we do another thing by this bill, if we can proceed in this haphazard way, with the Senator's kindly permission. You will make it an advantage to A, whom I used in my illustration, to sell $10,000 of his bonds, because by selling $10,000 of his second issue of these bonds he can turn around and buy $10,000 of the fourth issue of bonds, and thus he can get an exemption upon his whole $20,000; and instead of your sustaining these bonds and keeping them up in the market you will make it advantageous to a man to put his bonds on the market.

Mr. SIMMONS. Why would not that apply to the man who is a small purchaser of bonds as well as the man who has a large number of bonds?

Mr. REED. I am speaking of the man who can not buy. If you would exempt $20,000 in everybody's hand it would afford a price for a large volume of these bonds. Then, providing that everybody should have an exemption on the new issue in proportion to what he could buy, with a limit that he could not have an exemption beyond $40,000, you would have created a condition of equality and you would have very much more sustained your bonds.

I will say to the Senator frankly I am not speaking for myself, and I, of course, care nothing from my own standpoint; but I just recall the fact that when the second bond issue came along—the first bond issue was small—I subscribed to it to a moderate amount. I subscribed, first and last, something over $30,000 of those bonds. Under the rules you are establishing here I could sell half of my bonds and take the discount and turn around and invest it in the new issue in order to obtain an exemption, and make money by the transaction. That forces these bonds on the market, which ought never to be done. No patriotic citizen ought to want to sell them, at a discount particularly.

He ought not to sell them at all unless he has to do so. But it accomplishes that, and then unless he does sell them it leaves him to pay taxes, while the banker who can take double the amount of bonds, who has the ability to do it, will escape taxation. I say the proposition strikes me as defective, to use a very mild term.

Mr. SIMMONS. Undoubtedly we can imagine a great many cases in which almost any exemption that we might make could be worked to the advantage of one man, and could not be worked to the advantage of another man. Of course it is inherent in this system of taxation, but a man who is not able to purchase any of the next issue of bonds should not get the benefit of the exemption as to prior issues.

The only remedy for that, Mr. President, as I see it, would be a flat exemption of a certain amount of the previous issues without reference to the purchases made of the second issue. For reasons which, I take it, were very carefully worked and thought out, it was deemed unwise to make a flat exemption of the other bonds, and the exemption which is offered here is for the purpose, as I understand, or it is chiefly for the purpose, of encouraging the purchase of the proposed issue.

Mr. REED. Is it not also to sustain and keep all bonds that the Government has issued at par?

Mr. SIMMONS. That, undoubtedly, is a secondary but important purpose.

Mr. REED. Now, the Senator says it has been deemed advisable. I do not suppose that he means that he deems it advisable from the expression he used, but that the Senator means that the Treasury Department drew this bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. There is no concealment of the fact that the Treasury Department drew the bill.

Mr. REED. I have no reflections to cast on the Treasury Department. I think that, speaking broadly, their financial conduct in affairs has been very wise, but this bill comes now to the great Finance Committee of the Senate, of which the Senator from North Carolina is the distinguished head, and I think when it comes from that committee the wisdom of all these things must pass in review before the committee and before this body. I have no hesitancy in saying this is a very foolish provision, I do not care who deems it advisable. I have seen officials down at the other end of the Capitol, and even in the Treasury Department, deem things very advisable that they had to change their own minds on. I should like to know the reason——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I might agree with him if the sole purpose of this measure was to stabilize the market price of the bonds, but that is not the sole purpose. If you are to make it an incentive to buy, it is necessary that a person should not be given this exemption on previous bonds unless he invests in the last-proposed issue of bonds.

Mr. REED. Well, of course, if a man accepts everything just because somebody told him to take it, there is not any use arguing that sort of a question.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, now, the Senator will not put me in that light. I do not suppose the Senator means that I accept everything?

Mr. REED. I was not addressing myself to the Senator; I am addressing myself to this doctrine that is being advanced that it is simply to sell the new bonds. I would not say anything unpleasant to the Senator; he knows that.

Mr. SIMMONS. I realize that.

Mr. REED. You want to sell the new bonds, do you? Well, the Government has a contract that it has made with the people of the United States who buy these bonds. The first issue of these bonds that was made contained a guarantee to the American people who might buy them that they should carry with them every advantage of any other bond that was ever issued. The second issue contained the same provision, and the third issue contained a like provision. Upon the faith of that undertaking, men and women in the country invested their money in these bonds. So, if I bought a bond for even $100 of any one of those loans, I was guaranteed by the Government of the United States that that bond would have every advantage that every other issue of bonds might have, and would be interchangeable for any other issue of bonds; that if you issued bonds at a greater rate of interest or bonds containing any other greater advantages, the owner of that $100 bond was to have the privilege of availing himself of those new advantages. Now you come along and say he shall not have the same privilege as some people may have who purchase the bonds of the fourth loan; that the people who purchase the bonds of the fourth loan shall gain an exemption of the taxation upon the bonds that they bought of the second issue, whereas the bonds that the other individual bought shall be off in a different class and shall not have an exemption. I say that in a court of equity, if it were a matter that could be brought in a court of equity and were a transaction between private individuals, you would not be permitted to do that thing.

If you want to sustain the credit of these bonds, to keep them at par, and keep people buying them, it must be by letting all the world know that the United States keeps the letter of its contract and the spirit of its contract; that, as is so well said in a side remark by the Senator from Mississippi, it deals with absolute justice and impartiality with everybody and with every question.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator knows that the provisions of the first liberty-loan act only allowed the holder of the bond to convert into any subsequent issue made before the termination of the war bearing a higher rate of interest; as to bonds of the second issue, and of the first converted, they had the chance to convert into the third, but if that was not done, no subsequent conversion can be made. If any of the bonds of the first issue are hereafter converted into bonds of the fourth issue, the holding of such fourth issue bonds does not carry any additional exemption to bonds of the first converted, second, or third issue. The conversion can be made only when the subsequently issued bonds bear a higher rate of interest, not if they carry some privilege that does not appertain to the bonds held. If such subsequent bonds bear a higher rate of interest, it is optional with the holder whether he will convert or not.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I ask the Senator from Missouri a question?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Probably my question would be more properly directed to the chairman of the Committee on Finance, but it is suggested by what the Senator from Missouri has said. Do I understand that an owner of bonds issued under the first liberty loan can not now convert them into the fourth liberty loan in any amount?

Mr. SIMMONS. He can convert them into any bonds bearing a higher rate of interest hereafter issued or thereafter issued.

Mr. TOWNSEND. So that the owner of the first liberty bonds in whatever amount can convert them into the fourth liberty loan on the terms upon which the fourth liberty loan is issued?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is my understanding.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I did not quite understand whether the Senator from Missouri understood it in that way or not, and I wanted to get that clear.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that presents a different question, and it gives a new light upon the very matter I am discussing. It comes to me with such suddenness that I am not certain that I analyze it correctly; but the bonds of the first liberty loan because they are nontaxable, although they only draw 3½ per cent, were selling a few days ago at 102½, while the bonds of the third liberty loan were selling at about 97¼, I think, and the bonds of the second liberty loan were as low as 95. Of course, I am stating it in the rough, and my figures may be subject to slight change.

The reason for this is found in the exemption from taxation of the first liberty loan bonds, and the reason for the difference in price between the second liberty loan bonds and the third liberty loan bonds is the difference in the rate of interest, although the second liberty loan bonds are convertible into third liberty loan bonds. I understand that a third liberty loan bond is not convertible into a fourth liberty loan bond, so that, if the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] were to be carried out, it occurred to me we are now providing a new advantage to the 3½ per cent bonds; that is to say, the owner of 3½ per cent bonds, I suspect, although I do not assert it, for I am speaking now without time for reflection, could convert—and I will ask the chairman of the committee if the holder of first liberty loan bonds could not convert—his bonds into fourth liberty loan bonds and apply to them the proviso of paragraph 2.

Mr. SIMMONS. Undoubtedly; no.

Mr. REED. So that, if I understand the chairman, and if he understands me, if I hold $1,000 of first liberty loan bonds, I can transmute them into the fourth liberty loan bonds, drawing 4¼ per cent, and then I can have those 4¼ per cent bonds exempted from taxation under this bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. And under the law.

Mr. REED. No; not under the law as it stands now, because the law as it stands now gives the holder of the 3½ per cent bonds the privilege of transmuting his bonds into the new bonds, but it does not give him any exemption from taxation, because the new bond is not exempt from taxation except as it is exempted under this clause.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was going to explain to the Senator what I meant by that statement, namely, that under the law the first issue of liberty bonds can be converted into any subsequent issue bearing a higher rate of interest. Now, under the law he is exempt as to the interest on $5,000 of bonds, and under this bill it is provided that where that conversion takes place hereafter the holder shall be entitled to an exemption of $30,000, as provided in paragraph 3 of this section. He is not entitled to this privilege under paragraph 2, except as to conversions heretofore made.

Mr. REED. Then we get to this point: I bought, say, $30,000 of the first liberty-loan issue—and I use this merely as an illustration—which are exempt from taxation, and I have $15,000 to invest in the new bond issue. I take my $30,000 of the first bond issue and transmute those bonds into $30,000 of the fourth bond issue. I then take $15,000 of my money and buy that many more 4¼ per cent bonds. I now have $45,000 in 4¼ per cent bonds totally exempt from taxation. It seems to me, Mr. President, that that is putting an enormous premium on the first bonds, and it is a discrimination in favor of the holder of those bonds. He gets an advantage that nobody else gets, and he gets an advantage that is not written in his bond. He is entitled under his bonds to transmute the 3½ per cent bonds into 4¼ per cent fourth liberty-loan bonds, but he is not entitled, except under this bill, to a further exemption from taxation on his 4¼ per cent bonds nor to purchase $15,000 more of them and have them exempted from taxation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think the Senator's criticism in one way is a just criticism. The object of that, as I understand, was to induce the holders of liberty bonds of the first issue to convert them into bonds of the fourth issue.

Mr. REED. For what reason?

Mr. SIMMONS. For this reason, Mr. President: The first liberty-loan bonds are exempted from taxation for all time to come. That exemption can never be taken away by the United States Government. The holders of the bonds which are to be sold, known as the fourth liberty-loan bonds, will only enjoy the privilege of exemption from excess profits and war profit taxes and surtaxes during the war and for two years after the war.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator think we are paying a pretty high price to get rid of that little issue? I will inquire how much was the first issue of liberty bonds?

Mr. SIMMONS. The first issue was something like $2,000,000,000.

Mr. President, as a matter of fact, by reason of this exemption from taxation feature, the bonds bearing 3½ per cent are selling in the market to-day higher than those bearing 4¼ per cent. The purpose of the Government in changing its policy with reference to those bonds is that they shall not bear the tax-exemption privilege, but shall bear a higher rate of interest. It was thought that it was to the interest of the Government, first, to put all of these bonds upon a parity with reference to permanent liability to taxation. Part of them were permanently exempt, to wit, the first issue; the remainder of them it is proposed in a qualified and modified way temporarily to exempt. It is possible that the exemption will not extend more than two or three years. If we can induce the holders of the first liberty loan bonds to convert them into the last issue of liberty loan bonds, we will subject them to tax for all time to come. That is thought to be a desirable thing to do.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, therefore, as I understand, the Treasury Department, with a view to inducing the holders of those bonds to make this conversion so as to limit the tax-free privilege, has thought it wise to give them the benefit of an exemption.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, let me suggest now that there are two thoughts which might come from the statement of the Senator. The first is that we can not blindly follow the Treasury Department in this bill or in any other bill, because it was the Treasury Department that came here and told us that we must pass a bill totally exempting the first issue of bonds from taxation, and already they tell us that that was so serious a mistake that they must pay a heavy premium to get those bonds back into the Treasury. If that is true, it is time that the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Senate itself should begin to consider these questions from a somewhat independent standpoint and not give too much weight to what the Treasury Department has recommended. It might be added that the Treasury Department came here and asked for a $2,000,000,000 loan, and evidently thought that was going to be quite sufficient to run for a considerable time, and they vastly underestimated the demand. All this I say without desiring in any way harshly to criticize the Treasury.

The second observation I want to make is that as an inducement to this surrender you are not only giving an increase of interest from 3½ per cent to 4¼ per cent, but you are extending the right of exemption itself beyond the original loan, and it is possible that it may go to the extent of $3,000,000,000 instead of $2,000,000,000. That is to say, the first loan was $2,000,000,000, totally exempt. That $2,000,000,000 of 3½ per cent bonds can now be transmuted into $2,000,000,000 of 4¼ per cent bonds, and then the owner of these $2,000,000,000 of bonds has the privilege of buying and having exempt $1,000,000,000 more of the 4¼ per cent bonds. So that in order to get rid of a nontaxable issue of $2,000,000,000 at 3½ per cent we transmute them into nontaxable bonds of $2,000,000,000 plus a further billion dollars of nontaxable bonds, all bearing 4¼ per cent.

It is true, as stated by the Senator in charge of the bill, the distinguished chairman of the committee, that this taxation exemption is not as broad as that which obtains with reference to the first issue, but it applies to a billion dollars more bonds than the first issue; it involves an increase in the rate from 3½ to 4¼ per cent; and as these exempted bonds will be largely held by the wealthy classes, because they are about the only classes that will be able to take advantage of it, they will gain exemptions on their surtaxes. I have not the slightest question but that when the account comes to be taken and the whole matter is figured up you will find that you are paying an enormous premium on the first issue of bonds.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator recognizes the fact that under the law of their issue the owners of bonds of the first issue will always be entitled to have them converted into bonds of any subsequent issue bearing a higher rate of interest.

Mr. REED. Exactly.

Mr. SIMMONS. That can not be avoided.

Mr. REED. That can not be avoided; but you are giving them that advantage, and then giving them the right to buy and have exempted an additional one-third of the new issue.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, not of the whole amount. Besides, no additional right to purchase bonds of the fourth issue is carried by owning bonds of the first issue.

Mr. REED. Up to $45,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is entirely wrong about that. If a man belonging to the very rich class that the Senator spoke of a little while ago owns these bonds in large volume, as the Senator says is the case, however large his holdings may be, if he holds a million or ten millions of them, he can only get this privilege for $30,000 of that total amount.

Mr. REED. I understand that, and he can acquire $45,000 exempt. Now, here is the way it works out——

Mr. SIMMONS. He can acquire $45,000 of the second and the third issues—that is, he can secure exemption for $45,000 of those issues only in case of a new subscription and purchase of $30,000 in the fourth issue, added to the $30,000 of the issue that the Senator is speaking about—the first issue—but if he owns $10,000,000 of bonds other than the first issue he can only get an exemption at a maximum of $80,000 of the $10,000,000, or if it is $20,000,000, or if it is $50,000,000, or if it is $60,000,000, he can not get an exemption for any larger amount.

Mr. REED. Exactly; I understand that. I frankly state that the $45,000 limitation is there. I also just as frankly state that it will not amount to a bawbee, and I will give my reason for the statement.

This is the way the thing works out: A concern has $250,000 of these first liberty bonds. It has a lot of clients, and through these clients it will make the subscription for these bonds; or a man has a family, and the bonds will be distributed around so that you need not trouble yourself; the exemption will be applied, and applied very broadly.

Let me tell you the reason why I make that statement. I remember, when Government bonds were exempted heretofore, that there were a lot of men in every community who managed to exempt a large amount of their property by having it in Government bonds; and if you had figured up the aggregate of those exemptions throughout the United States, they would have exceeded the Government bond issue by probably 10 or 15 to 1. Of course, it was a fraud worked, because the bonds were passed around from one man to another. The bank account of A was transmuted into bonds to-day, and he made his return, and the same bonds answered the same purpose for C, D, and E on other days. You are by this bill as it now stands giving the wealthy man who has $30,000 of the original bonds exempt from taxation the right to transmute them into $30,000 of 4¼ per cent bonds free from taxation and to buy and have free from taxation $15,000 more of those bonds, while the individual who can not do that will be obliged to hold his bonds without any exemption privilege. Now, it seems to me that that is utterly unjust and utterly indefensible. What I think would be the fair way to fix this matter would be to grant to every individual an exemption on a certain amount of bonds, and no more, and let that exemption apply to all of the issues of the bonds; and the minute you had a law by which any man owning Government bonds up to the amount, let me say, of $10,000, could claim an exemption from taxation, I have not the slightest doubt in the world but that the result would be that these bonds of ours would come to par, and probably stay at par, which is a thing that everyone of us most earnestly desires.

I go back, and I finish what I have to say—though it is in the nature of repetition—to this proposition: Take the man who invested all the money he could raise in the second liberty loan, and did so out of patriotic motives. That man must continue to pay taxes. The man who has money to invest in the fourth liberty loan can, by investing in that loan, escape taxes upon the bonds that he bought up to $45,000. I do not think that is wise. I do not think it is fair. I do not think it will strengthen this bond issue. It will offer an inducement to men to sell a part of the bonds that they now hold in order that they may buy bonds of the fourth liberty loan with the proceeds and thus escape taxation by having that much of the nontaxable bonds. I think you will find it disastrous.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator please, I had not quite finished my statement.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wanted to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to a matter which seems to me pertinent to the discussion of the first and second sections of this bill, and that is that the present finance bill, now before the committee, contains provisions which would entirely nullify this exemption law. I have no doubt that the Finance Committee will remedy that or take it into consideration, but there are some other things in connection with that provision which I should like now to call to the attention of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator point out the sections of the pending bill to which he refers?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes. In the present finance bill, section 214, under "Deductions allowed from the net income which is taxed," occurs the following:

All interest paid or accrued within the taxable year on indebtedness in excess of interest received free from taxation under this title.

And the same exemption or deduction is allowed, under section 234, as to corporations. Now, the result will be, if that becomes a law, that while under the bill which we propose to pass a holder of Government bonds would be entitled to an exemption of the interest on $75,000 of them if he complied with all the conditions, it would be offset against interest which he legitimately paid in his business, and it would not be allowed to him at all. In other words, you would completely nullify this law by the deductions provided for in the revenue bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator, of course, knows that this bill, although it is here while the revenue bill is still in the House, is a subsequent measure.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am coming to that.

Mr. SIMMONS. If there is the conflict which the Senator has pointed out—and I do not wish to express an opinion about that now, because my committee has very carefully refrained from expressing any opinions at all about this bill while it is pending in the House—but if there is anything in this bond bill, which I say was originated and passed before action by it on the revenue bill, which is still pending there, which is inconsistent with the revenue bill, I assume that the House, before the bill leaves that body, will make the necessary correction. If it does not, then of course the Finance Committee will have to take up and consider that matter.

Mr. KELLOGG. The House has not done it yet. I simply call that to the attention of the Finance Committee because I think the good faith of the Congress will be pledged to maintain this exemption; but I may call the attention of the committee to the fact that that would nullify other exemptions. It would practically tax every State bond, although the bonds had already been issued, and it would tax the income from the first liberty loan bonds. I think that should be borne in mind by the Finance Committee when it considers this question of taxation of income.

Mr. SIMMONS. Surely the Senator will understand that I fully appreciate his purpose about it, and the Finance Committee will be glad to have his views before it when it takes up these questions.

Mr. President, I do not wish to follow the argument of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] further than to say that I recognize, as all of us do, the fact that the Treasury Department, and I might say the Congress, has changed its policy with reference to these bonds since the passage of the first act. The first act was passed only a few days after the declaration of war by this Government. At that time it had been the unbroken policy of this Government to exempt its bonds from taxation. At that time nobody even dreamed that the amount of bonds we would be compelled to issue as the result of this war would attain to any such magnitude as it has already attained to and as it will likely attain to before we are through with this business. The change of policy on the part of the Treasury Department, I have no doubt, is the result of a suggestion which has been made throughout the country that before this war is over there will be an immense burden transmitted to future generations growing out of the interest charges upon these bonds. It has been found necessary since the first issue to increase those interest charges to the extent of nearly 1 per cent. The feeling has grown up in the country that under these circumstances, if there were no other reasons for it, the traditional policy of the Government with reference to the exemption of bonds from taxation should not any longer be adhered to.

Another reason, Mr. President, which has greatly contributed to this change of policy is the apprehension, owing to the fact that we are issuing these bonds in such enormous volume, that if they are absolutely tax free it might be an inducement to the holders of large capital in this country to invest the main part of their estate in these bonds and thereby remove the larger part of the holdings of the rich from the possibility of having to contribute anything in the future toward the liquidation of the mountain of debt which will confront the people of this country when the war closes.

I can well understand, Mr. President, that without making any serious mistake of judgment, when you take into consideration the different circumstances which have arisen since the first issue, the Treasury Department should have changed its mind and that the country should have changed its mind. No doubt when we passed that first act it was the feeling throughout the country that the bonds ought to be free of taxation, just as all other bonds had been, but the developments of the war have presented a new situation, and on account of the considerations to which I have called attention, I think there is now a general crystallization of opinion among the people of the country that it would be very unfortunate when the war closes if these bonds should be found in the hands of a few very wealthy people and corporations, and so held by them that they never could be reached by the tax gatherer, and this enormous amount of indebtedness, which may reach to thirty or forty or fifty billion dollars, representing a very considerable portion of the aggregate wealth of this country, might in that way entirely escape the burden of taxation, so far as the discharge of this indebtedness is concerned.

It is almost impossible to frame a general revenue or financial scheme of legislation which exempts from possible discriminations as between all classes under all conceivable conditions.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. FALL. I notice that the committee in its report has stricken out of the bill——

Mr. SIMMONS. Will not the Senator let me just finish this point?

Mr. FALL. I was simply predicating a question upon the Senator's present statement.

Mr. SIMMONS. I thought the Senator was going to refer to some other point.

Mr. FALL. I notice that section 5 is stricken out of the bill. I have here the quotations of bonds. The first liberty bonds, 3½, quoted at $100——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I want to discuss that elimination a minute later.

Mr. FALL. Very well; if the Senator objects, I will not interrupt him.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course if the Senator says it is pertinent to what I have been saying, I will yield.

Mr. FALL. The Senator was speaking of the conversion of bonds; that we could convert the first liberty 3½ per cent bonds and sell them at $100 and over; but your second, which you are exempting here, are at $95. That is the question in a few words.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is not a question whether a man will convert the bonds, it is a question whether he has a right to convert them. He already has the right to convert the first liberty-loan bonds, that are selling higher than the other issues, into any subsequent issue bearing a higher rate of interest.

Mr. FALL. The Senator does not catch the point I am making. You are proposing to increase the price of these bonds by exempting them from certain taxes. Is not that the purpose of your bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; that is one purpose.

Mr. FALL. That is it, exactly. Then you are still allowing the man holding first liberty 3½ per cent bonds to go on the market and sell them for $100.10 and buy the second or the third liberty-loan issues for $95 or $96, as the case may be, under the quotations, and then convert them into the new liberty-loan bonds, free of taxes at 100 cents on the dollar, making some $4 to $5 on each bond unless you retain in the bill the provision contained in section 5. That is the question.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator overlooks the fact, I think, that the exemption which accrues to the holder of the first liberty-loan issue bond is a permanent exemption, and that the second and third issues can not be converted into the fourth issue.

Mr. FALL. I understand that; the first liberty-loan bonds are exempted, and for that reason the price is $100; but the provision contained in the original bill was that the President might stop the sale of bonds on the market. If you do not stop the sale of bonds on the market, the holder will sell his first liberty bonds at $100. Then he buys bonds bearing 4¼ per cent interest, which you increase to $100, if your present bill avails anything.

Mr. SIMMONS. When he buys a bond bearing 4¼ per cent interest he surrenders the permanent tax exemption and he becomes subject to all the surtaxes and profits taxes we are now levying and will levy.

Mr. FALL. If that is the case and the first liberty bonds, subject to all the exemptions, are only worth $100, you certainly do not expect to bring the second or third or fourth issue up to $100 by the passage of this bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, no man can tell what is going to be the effect of this bill, but I think it will be the judgment of this country, as it is of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the Finance Committee, that there should be a temporary exemption of these bonds from the payment of taxes which were high when we first levied them, and which will be double in the present bill, practically, and which in future bills may be higher even than at present. It is not very much, but the exemption will continue during the period of excessive taxation, because while we can not hope that we will return to normal conditions in the matter of taxation, all of us believe, at least all of us hope, that at the end of two years after the war we will be able to greatly reduce taxes. So we believe that the exemption of these bonds from taxes during this period of high taxation will furnish quite an inducement for the purchase of those bonds and it undoubtedly will exercise a very potent influence in increasing their market value.

Whether it will bring them to par nobody knows, but this is not the only expedient that we have adopted to bring these bonds to par. Everybody knows that the Treasury Department has already measurably stabilized and increased the market value of the bonds by the use of funds for the purchase of these bonds furnished by the War Finance Corporation act. It is the purpose of the Treasury Department to use not one means but every well thought out and promising means that may occur to it as likely to affect the value of these bonds and maintain them at something like their par value.

Mr. President, that is one of the objects of this bill. The other object, as I explained in the beginning, is to help the Government in floating the enormous amount of bonds for which it is about to ask the American people to subscribe. Billions of dollars of bonds are to be thrown upon the market by the Government in a few days. That follows the sale by this Government already of about $10,000,000,000 of bonds. It is felt, and I think that everybody appreciates that the feeling is one justified by the conditions, that every possible inducement which the Government can offer should be offered to the American people to buy these bonds. It is felt that it would be unwise to raise the rate of interest, because once you fix the rate higher than it is fixed to-day you can not escape it. Bonds that have been issued in the past become convertible into that. Every bond that is issued in the future must bear that higher rate of interest.

The Treasury Department for those reasons has reached the conclusion that it would be unwise to attempt to further induce the public to invest in these bonds by increasing the interest charge, and it has had recourse to accomplishing the same purpose, possibly not so effectively, by reducing temporarily during the period of high taxation in this country the taxes which these purchasers of bonds would have to pay on the income derived from their bonds.

If we should adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and make a flat exemption of $30,000 of bonds of the fourth issue and also a flat exemption of a like amount of bonds of previous issues, there would be no incentive to purchase growing out of the exemption given as to past issues. That would simply be granting a privilege to them, but in the granting of the privilege you would not make the granting an incentive to purchase these fourth liberty bonds. That is the purpose here. Therefore, the bill provides that in order to get the benefit of the exemptions as to bonds already issued there must be a subscription and purchase of the new issue. Where there is a subscription and purchase of the new issue then the benefit of the exemption is extended, not to the amount of the purchase but to an additional one and a half times the amount of the purchase, if the subscriber owns bonds of the first converted, second, or third issues to that extent.

But, Mr. President, I am not going to contend—it would be folly to contend—that you can devise a system of taxation in this country and permit an exemption from taxation which will be absolutely balanced and absolutely devoid of any discrimination between classes or between individual investors and individual taxpayers in the country.

Since we have had these revenue bills up here I think two-thirds of the time of the Finance Committee—the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is a member of that committee and will, I think, bear me out—has been devoted to trying as best we could to adjust and remove these inequalities and these discriminations. But, Mr. President, we have been unable to do it, and you can not possibly frame any system of taxation along these lines, and of exemptions, such as we must have in connection with this matter of taxation and this matter of bond issue, that will not be subject to criticism from one standpoint or another with reference to discriminations and inequalities. The exemptions in this particular case, if there be slight discriminations, are not discriminations of a character, in my judgment, that will amount to any serious harm or operate to bring about any serious injustice.

Mr. President, there are two other sections of the bill to which I wish to call attention. The first section that I wish to call attention to, that I have not already spoken about, is section 5, as amended. It is section 6 in the bill as passed by the House, but section 5 in the bill as amended by the committee. Under the present law, the national-banking act, a bank is not permitted to loan to any one person more than 10 per cent of its capital and surplus.

That provision of law is amended in this act so as to allow the banks to loan upon notes secured by liberty bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the United States at their face value to an amount equal to an additional 10 per cent of their capital stock and surplus. That is to say, if a bank has exhausted its loaning power to any one person under the present law, it is permitted to loan an additional amount not in excess of 10 per cent of its capital and surplus, provided the note or obligation upon which loan is predicated is secured by bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the United States issued after April 24, 1917.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DILLINGHAM in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Do I understand from the statement just made that this proviso in the section the Senator is now discussing, which reads as follows: "secured by not less than a like face amount of bonds of the United States," was intended to cover all three classes of paper?

Mr. SIMMONS. It says "purchase or discount of any note or notes" secured by such bonds "or certificates of indebtedness" or "discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values," and also includes certificates of indebtedness and bonds of the United States issued since April 24, 1917.

Mr. POMERENE. Let me try to make myself a little clearer, if possible. You provide not in excess of 10 per cent for "the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values." Does it mean that when thus discounted they shall be secured by these bonds?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I understand that bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values need not be secured by either the bonds or by certificates of indebtedness.

Mr. POMERENE. And also that the second class shall be so secured:

> The discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person, company, corporation, or firm negotiating the same.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; they are not required to be so secured.

Mr. POMERENE. I think they should be, but my objection is perhaps to the punctuation. It seems to me that as it reads now the phrase "secured by not less than a like face amount of bonds" applies only to third class of paper which can be discounted.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator is wrong about that. Let me read the whole sentence. It amends the present law, which is section 5200 of the Revised Statutes, so as to make it read:

> The total liabilities to any association, of any person, or of any company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including in the liabilities of a company or firm the liabilities of the several members thereof, shall at no time exceed 10 per cent of the amount of the capital stock of such association, actually paid in and unimpaired, and 10 per cent of its unimpaired surplus fund: Provided, however, That (1) the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values, (2) the discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person, company, corporation, or firm negotiating the same, and (3) the purchase or discount of any note or notes secured by not less than a like face amount of bonds of the United States issued since April 24, 1917.

Mr. POMERENE. I have no objection to it if it applies to all three classes, but it seems to me as it reads here that that security only applies to the third class, namely, the purchase or discount of any note or notes. I suggest putting a comma after "notes," in line 22, and it seems to me it would then bear the construction which the Senator places upon it. I ask that that amendment be made, then, if the Senator has no objection to it.

Mr. WARREN. I rose to ask another question. This seems to predicate loans upon the full face value of these bonds, whether they should be at par or below par. Of course, that really undermines the fundamental principle of banking, and especially of national banking under law and rules, because even in trust companies it is the practice and rule that in the ordinary securities that are on the market every day, and it is possible they may be as good as the Government securities, and certainly they are very good, it is considered well not to loan more than 80 or at the extreme 90 per cent of the real value.

Mr. SIMMONS. This says "not less than a like face amount of bonds." That would be a matter left with the bank.

Mr. WARREN. That leaves the bank where they can disregard all the rules and customs heretofore governing the loaning of money upon security. I do not think it is necessary to do that.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator is laboring under a misapprehension.

Mr. WARREN. Not at all.

Mr. SIMMONS. "The purchase or discount of any note or notes secured by not less than a like face amount of bonds?"

Mr. WARREN. Yes; that applies to money loaned on the certificates or bonds of the Government.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is, the amount of bonds deposited to secure the paper must be at least of equal value.

Mr. WARREN. Exactly.

Mr. SIMMONS. They must have at least the same face value.

Mr. WARREN. I do not misunderstand it at all, but the loaning of money on security is always supposed to have a margin between the amount of money loaned and the face or even current cash value of security against changes in the market.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not understand it to mean that the bank would have to loan up to the face value of the hypothecated bonds.

Mr. WARREN. That is true; but it gives the bank privileges under this that never have been accorded it, which it has never been considered good policy to accord heretofore, by allowing it to loan upon only the face of Government bonds, which may be or may not be par, which may be 90 cents or 95 cents, as they are to-day. For instance, a man can go in with $20,000 of bonds, worth perhaps $19,000, or a little more, and if the bank were willing he could borrow $20,000, and the man might not be of any account himself and the bank would lose the difference, of course.

Mr. SIMMONS. That would only be a question as to the effect of the credit of the bank.

Mr. WARREN. Heretofore in all legislation that I am conversant with—and I think the Senator will find it to be true—there is always at least 10 per cent difference, generally more, between the face value of the security offered and the amount that is loaned. I call that to the attention of the chairman of the committee. I think it is rather an unsafe provision in the law.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I wish to call——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has proposed an amendment, and it will be stated.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is to that amendment that I wish to speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That the parliamentary situation may be made clear the Chair will have the amendment reported.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 22, after the word "notes," it is proposed to insert a comma.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] is far more important and far-reaching than its suggestion would indicate. I think the construction of this language as made by the Senator from Ohio is correct; and it is to the point of the necessity for amending the language of the bill as it is written that I speak. The language which the Senator from Ohio seeks to change, assuming now, for the sake of the argument, that his——

Mr. SIMMONS. That involves the question of an amendment; and would not the Senator from Arkansas defer his statement until I finish? I am about to conclude.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will defer a further statement concerning this matter until the Senator from North Carolina shall have finished, and now content myself with the statement that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio will defeat one of the primary purposes of the bill if it is agreed to. His amendment would make more rigid the limitation on the power of national banks to make loans in certain cases when sound policy justifies that the rule be relaxed in some particulars.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am very thankful to the Senator from Arkansas for giving his attention to this matter. While on my feet I could not, of course, examine it very carefully, and it appeared to me that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio would simply clarify the provision and would have no other effect.

Mr. President, there is one other section of the bill of some importance which I ought to call the attention of the Senate to, and I shall do so in a very few words. Your committee has recommended the striking out of section 5 of the House bill. That section is practically, to all intents and purposes, a provision taken from the trading-with-the-enemy act; the language, except as I shall point out, is exactly the same as is found in that act. The only difference is a slight amendment conferring upon the President the power to "investigate, regulate, or prohibit, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, by means of licenses or otherwise, any transactions in * * * bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the United States," and the addition in another connection of the words "hoarding and melting."

That power is added to the other powers conferred in this particular section of the so-called trading-with-the-enemy act. Your committee fully appreciated the purposes of the Treasury Department in proposing to invest the President with this broad and sweeping power, and they recognized the fact that the President, of course, would never, under any circumstances at all thinkable, make any regulation or prohibition in this matter, except with the bona fide purpose of appreciating the value of these bonds or maintaining them at a proper standard of value, and that the country had nothing to fear from that source, either from the present occupant of the White House or his successors, for it is absolutely unthinkable that any President of the United States would exercise that power for the purpose of depressing an obligation of the United States or for the purpose of making it less valuable in the hands of any holder or for the purpose of embarrassing or annoying any holder of those securities. The committee had no apprehension on that score, but your committee did feel that to give this broad power to the President would probably have a very serious effect not only upon the value of the bonds already issued, but would have a depressing influence upon the flotation of future issues.

I do not wish to elaborate that, Mr. President, but simply to state to the Senate that for these reasons your committee felt constrained to recommend that that section be eliminated from the bill.

I will not detain the Senate any longer.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, recurring now to the topic which I was discussing a moment ago while the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] had the floor, namely, the effect of section 5 of the bill, I repeat that, in my opinion, the construction of this language as made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] is correct, and that it would be unfortunate and would defeat one of the fundamental purposes of the bill if his amendment should prevail.

The effect of the language as it is now written, in my opinion, would be to relieve three classes of transactions from the rule; that is, the rule limiting to 10 per cent of the capital stock and surplus the amounts which a bank may loan to any one person, association, or corporation. The first two classes are embraced in the present law.

However, I also point out the fact that there is a safeguard in a later portion of the section, which is designed to prevent any harm resulting from the provision, while securing the benefits which it is desired to provide. That language reads as follows:

> But the total liabilities to any association, of any person, or of any company, corporation, or firm, upon any note or notes purchased or discounted by such association and secured by such bonds or certificates of indebtedness, shall not exceed (except to the extent permitted by rules and regulations prescribed by the Comptroller of the Currency, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury) 10 per cent of such capital stock and surplus fund of such association.

If the comma is inserted after the word "notes," on line 22, page 5, of the bill, it will require that in all of these transactions the loan be secured by bonds or by certificates of Government indebtedness; if the comma is not inserted, the language would not warrant that requirement. It would simply provide that in three classes of cases the rule might be relaxed—

> (1) the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values, (2) the discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person, company, corporation, or firm, negotiating the same, and (3) the purchase or discount of any note or notes secured by not less than a like face amount of bonds of the United States issued since April 24, 1917, or certificates of indebtedness of the United States.

This legislation is the result of much consideration on the part of the Treasury Department. It should be amended so as to include warehouse receipts on staple products.

The Committee on Banking and Currency, through its chairman, some time ago reported a bill containing substantially, if not exactly, the language under consideration. In many localities, particularly where crops mature at definite seasons, and large quantities are to be handled at a given time, the existing provision of law is absolutely unworkable. It has been regarded as such for a long time. Take, for instance, the handling of the cotton crop. That crop requires an enormous amount of money during the months of September, October, and November, and perhaps some subsequent months. The same is true, though in a different degree, of the various grains, such as wheat and corn. In cotton transactions it is a practical impossibility to handle the crop without some relaxation of this rule.

From the very necessity of the case, this rule has not been strictly regarded in transactions of this character by the banks; and if they had regarded it strictly much greater difficulties than we have experienced would have been encountered in handling these various crops. The Clearing House Association of the city of Little Rock, or its representatives, took up the matter some time ago, and a bill was introduced in the Senate which was designed to accomplish this purpose, one of the principal differences between the bill that I introduced and the bill that was reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency being that the Federal Reserve Board in the former bill had the authority which is conferred in the pending measure on the Comptroller of the Currency, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. This difference is one apparently not very material.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator refers to the construction placed on this language. He means, I take it, the proposed section 5200?

Mr. ROBINSON. No. I mean section 5, which is an amendment of section 5200. The language to which I particularly refer is the proviso commencing on line 16. The Senator from Ohio made an inquiry some time ago, during the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina, as to whether or not bonds or certificates of indebtedness would be required as security in all three of these classes of transactions; and the opinion was expressed, I think, without sufficient consideration, that such would be the case. I do not think, however, that it is the case. I think it would be unfortunate, for instance, if the language of the bill be so changed as to require bonds or certificates of indebtedness in order to make advances on warehouse receipts in the handling of crops.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I wish to state that at the time the Senator from Ohio called my attention to the matter I did give expression to the views as stated by the Senator from Arkansas. I did so, however, without reflection and without close examination; but I find, as a matter of fact, that the Senator from Arkansas is clearly right. The first two subdivisions, No. 1 and No. 2, are already in the present law, and the purpose is simply to add to them an additional security that may be negotiated.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to ask the Senator if I am right, that the only change made in section 5200 is the addition of the third clause? Outside of that, is it a reenactment of section 5200?

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not think so. I will ask the Senator from North Carolina if it is a mere reenactment of existing law, with the exception of the third clause?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think so. The third section is merely added.

Mr. ROBINSON. Under existing law the rule is inflexible, as I understand—and if the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] were present, he would undoubtedly be familiar with that—but my understanding is that the rule is inflexible under existing law; that at this time there is no authority anywhere to permit a national bank to loan to any one individual, association, or corporation more than 10 per cent of its capital stock unimpaired and its surplus. The law excepts certain transactions which are defined as not being loans. But the rule as to loans is quite rigid.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator from Arkansas is right about that.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think that is a correct statement of the law. The question was asked if this provision was a mere re-enactment of existing law, with the exception of the third clause, and the Senator from North Carolina answered that it was.

Mr. SIMMONS. The present law is as follows:

SEC. 5200. The total liabilities to any association, of any person, or of any company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including in the liabilities of a company or firm the liabilities of the several members thereof, shall at no time exceed one-tenth part of the amount of the capital stock of such associations, actually paid in and unimpaired and one-tenth part of its unimpaired surplus fund: Provided, however.

The proviso that follows is stricken out, but the language I have read is also that of the pending bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator is not reading the law; he is reading a bill that has been reported but not passed, and to which I have referred. I will read the law, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me for just a moment, since the text before the Senator from Arkansas was printed, the law has been amended so as to enable the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values, and so as to include the discount of commercial and business paper actually owned by the person, company, corporation, or firm negotiating the same. That was intended to cover cotton drafts and transactions of that kind.

Mr. ROBINSON. When was that passed?

Mr. OWEN. That was passed a year or two ago. I will get the exact date for the Senator. Now, the third provision which is added here is intended to allow the banks further opportunity of using Government bonds without having the loan on such bonds charged against an individual. That is all there is to section 5.

I think the objection which has been made to the broad character of the second provision, "the discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person, company, corporation, or firm negotiating the same," really ought to be modified so as to have it read "business paper of classes approved by the Federal Reserve Board," because there is no limitation upon that; and the fear which Senators naturally have that banks might be led into extending credits unsafely, I think has some foundation. I had intended to suggest an amendment to the second subdivision, so as to make it read:

The discount of commercial or business paper of classes approved by the Federal Reserve Board actually owned—

And so forth.

That would remove any danger, I think.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is the provision which I myself suggested and had incorporated in a bill that is pending before the Committee on Banking and Currency. The Senator is correct about that.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator that this language is incorporated in a bill that has already passed the Senate.

Mr. OWEN. In a bill which has passed the House.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, it has also passed the House.

Mr. OWEN. It has been reported favorably by the Senate committee with certain amendments.

Mr. SIMMONS. But it has passed both bodies. It passed the House as a House bill and passed the Senate as a Senate bill.

Mr. OWEN. No; it has not yet passed the Senate; it has only been reported to the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. My understanding was that it had been passed by the Senate.

Mr. OWEN. No; it has not been passed by the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. But it has been reported by the committee?

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. The language of the law, being section 5200 of the Revised Statutes, second edition, 1878, is this:

SEC. 5200. The total liabilities to any association, of any person, or of any company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including, in the liabilities of a company or firm, the liabilities of the several members thereof, shall at no time exceed one-tenth part of the amount of the capital stock of such association actually paid in. But the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values, and the discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person negotiating the same, shall not be considered as money borrowed.

That is the language to which I think the Senator from Oklahoma referred as being in a subsequent statute. That is the law on the subject now; but, notwithstanding that law, it has been construed to prevent national banks from loaning to one individual under any circumstances more than one-tenth of their unimpaired surplus and capital stock.

I am heartily in favor of the provisions of the bill as the committee has reported it, because if the amendment of the Senator from Ohio is agreed to it will reaffirm the interpretation of the existing statute and also compel the authorities to require Government bonds or certificates of indebtedness to secure all three classes of these transactions.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARREN. Adding to the remarks I made a moment ago, upon reading the first, second, and third provisions again, I am perfectly satisfied that the Senator from Arkansas is right, although the language is ambiguous, and I think ought to be amended to make it plain. Evidently it is intended, under the first and second provisions, to follow the practice that has been followed heretofore. Perhaps there has been an inhibition on the banks to some extent, somewhat as the Senator says, but to my certain knowledge the practice of banks has been to buy bills of exchange and commercial paper without exacting additional collateral security. So I think the intention of this is, as the Senator has stated, only to require the security of bonds under the third subdivision. My previous remarks were mainly directed to the loaning of the full face value, regardless of what the market value might be. That involves a question which I think ought to be taken under consideration, and a decision reached whether that is good policy or not. It is somewhat new and perhaps dangerous.

Mr. ROBINSON. The sum and substance of the argument, as it appeals to me, is that in all probability the existing statute was intended to accomplish as to the first two transactions what this proposed statute seems to reenact, but it has been construed to prevent the loaning by any bank of more than one-tenth of its capital stock and unimpaired surplus to one person. That is the feature of the bill that I want some relief against. In the enormous transactions in the West and in the South for the handling of crops, and particularly with reference to the cotton crop, that feature of the law is unworkable. I wish to read just a part of a letter which I received from the vice president of the American National Bank at Little Rock, Ark. He says:

We would certainly appreciate your utmost efforts in having this paragraph attached to section 11 of the present Federal reserve act—

The paragraph to which he refers is the bill that I subsequently introduced and had referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency—

Unless some provision is made whereby national banks in cotton-growing States have the privilege of loaning more than the present 10 per cent of capital stock and surplus limit, it is certainly going to put all the southern cotton business in the hands of the State banks and cut off from the national banks a very profitable branch of their business.

During the fall of the year a large amount of our loans are made on cotton, and where the cotton accounts are handled correctly and sufficient margin is always secured to cover such loans I do not believe that there is a safer method of lending money than on loans secured by cotton which is stored in responsible warehouses, fully insured, etc.

I believe that the records will show that throughout the South there has been less money lost by banks on loans made on cotton than by loans made on any other class of security. Of course, I appreciate that in the case of a careless bank or banker there is an opportunity for unreliable cotton concerns to take advantage of the banks making loans, borrowing too much money on their cotton, and in consequence causing the bank to suffer loss should cotton prices suffer a severe fall, but I do not see any reason why well-managed banks should be made to suffer a loss of one of their best branches of business just because a very few banks do not conduct their business on business principles.

We are very anxious to get the above-outlined paragraph added to the new Federal reserve act.

Mr. President, that is a statement of conditions, under this limitation, as they relate to a very important industry, namely, the cotton industry. The same rules apply, in different degree, of course, in the handling of the wheat and the corn crops. This limitation of loans is, of course, intended to prevent unreliable persons who enjoy the confidence of bank officers from looting the banks, which sometimes occurred prior to the enactment of the statute. The provision is in the main a very wise and a very wholesome one. I would be the very last Senator to take any action which I thought would destroy its beneficial purposes and results; but, at the same time, while it has safeguarded banking interests and probably prevented the wrecking of some banks, it has imposed a condition of hardship upon some of the great industries of this country, from which, in my opinion, it is our duty to seek to relieve them in such manner as to retain reasonable safeguards. The language which the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] will suggest in all probability will relieve the situation and make the meaning clearer.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I wish to ask the Senator what limitations are placed by the law of his State upon the amount of loans by State banks?

Mr. ROBINSON. There is no such limitation with which I am familiar in the matter of the amount of loans to any one person, except in the case of certain officers of banks and other specified persons. The law is undoubtedly designed to accomplish a very wholesome and necessary purpose, and it has worked well in many respects but oppressively in the matters which I have mentioned.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I merely wish briefly to state my position. I am very glad that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has agreed with me on the construction that is to be placed on this language as it is in the bill and as it would be if the amendment which I have suggested were adopted. If there is no limitation placed upon the amount of loans that may be made to an individual by a State bank in any State, I very much regret to hear that that condition of things is permitted to continue. Under the present law the purpose was to limit the amount of loans to individuals to 10 per cent of the paid-in capital and surplus. Under the amendment proposed by the committee here, in addition to that 10 per cent, one man could borrow an additional 10 per cent "on the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actual existing values" or "the discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person, company, corporation, or firms negotiating the same," or, third, upon "the purchase or discount of any note or notes." In other words, if this bill goes through in its present form, one man can borrow 20 per cent of the capital and the surplus of a bank, and only in cases where the bank purchases or discounts any note or notes must there be additional security.

I recognize the fact that sometimes it works a hardship to have any limitation upon a bank, but my guess is that while some of the bankers in the South or elsewhere may not be permitted to do what they would like to do, and thereby some men may be embarrassed, if you are going to permit generally the borrowing of 20 per cent of the capital and surplus by one individual, a little bit later on, when there comes a readjustment of our affairs there will be a good many bank failures and cotton men or grain men will be less able to get their financial accommodations than they are now.

The conditions in the South and in the West are not different from the conditions in such States as Ohio and elsewhere. In one case they deal with the raisers and dealers in cotton; in another with the producers and dealers in wheat; in another with the producers and dealers in iron or steel, or many other commodities. The banking principle involved is one and the same. My judgment is against this extension without this increase of security. Every Senator must make up his own mind as to what should be done, but that is the way I shall vote upon it; and I think it would be an unwise thing to permit this extension without that additional security.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, as stated by the Senator from North Carolina, this bill merely carries forward into the pending measure the existing provisions of law as to the first two classes of transactions. The only change in the language of the existing law as proposed by the measure under consideration is as to the third class of transactions, in which case bonds or certificates of indebtedness are required. My remarks as to the necessity for relaxing this rule would apply to an amendment to be proposed, as I understand, by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

The existing law says:

> But the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing value, and the discount of commercial or other business paper actually owned by the person negotiating the same, shall not be considered as money borrowed.

They construe that now to be a loan, whereas it is in reality a discount.

Mr. POMERENE. Let me see if I clearly understand the Senator. He has just quoted what has been the ruling of the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. ROBINSON. I really ought not to say what has been the ruling. I say that that section has been construed, notwithstanding its language, to prevent loans, for instance, on cotton, corn, and wheat when these commodities are drawn against. They have construed that to be a loan within the meaning of the statute, notwithstanding its language.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to say just one word about this matter.

There has been some confusion about the present law and the effect of this proposed amendment to the law. I was somewhat confused about it myself; but after a more careful and critical examination of the present law and this amendment, I am satisfied that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] ought not to be adopted, and that if adopted it would defeat the main purpose of the amendment.

As the Senator from Arkansas has said, by the amendment to section 5200 of the Revised Statutes heretofore made, the first two exceptions to the rule of allowing one person to borrow only 10 per cent of the capital of a bank had already been made. I do not know, of course, anything about the ruling of the Comptroller of the Currency and its effect upon the meaning of this act; but undoubtedly the amendment had been made, and undoubtedly the purpose of the lawmakers was to allow an additional amount, in excess of the 10 per cent originally prescribed by the statute, where the money was borrowed in the way of discount and a bill of exchange issued against actual values. That was regarded as a mere temporary transaction, the money being borrowed to-day and the obligation to be extinguished in a few days, or within a very short period of time. The same was true as to the second exception—the discount of commercial paper, of business paper. There the money was actually advanced upon the paper of a third person and simply the indorsement of the person who was discounting it, adding to it additional security; and in no sense ought that to be charged against the borrower for the purposes of the application of this limitation.

Mr. President, all that is accomplished by the amendment to this act proposed in the pending bill is to permit banks, in addition to the rights that they now have, to loan in excess of 10 per cent upon paper secured by Government bonds or certificates of indebtedness. That is not merely a question of the sufficiency of the security that may be offered. That is not merely a question of the amount of money that may be loaned to any one individual. It is a question that affects the power of the Government at this particular time to sell these liberty bonds.

Everybody knows that the business men of this country have borrowed from the banks practically up to the limitation in the law as it now exists, that many of them can not borrow another dollar; and yet, Mr. President, when they want to buy these liberty bonds it is absolutely necessary for them to go to the banks of the country. There is not a hamlet, there is not a village, there is not a city in this country, where the banks are not called upon to loan to the prospective purchasers of these bonds more money than they are authorized to loan under the present law in order to give them ability to make the purchase. The purpose of this amendment is to make it possible for the banks of this country to loan people of good credit, based upon the security of a United States bond, enough money to buy these bonds; and if there is a provision in this bill that accomplishes a good purpose in connection with the sale of these bonds—and this bill is drafted and presented for the purpose of aiding the Treasury in selling these bonds—it is this particular provision.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the first amendment of the committee, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On pages 4 and 5 the committee proposes to strike out all of section 5, as printed in the House bill, in the following words:

> SEC. 5. That clause (b) of section 5 of the trading-with-the-enemy act be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:
> "(b) That the President may investigate, regulate, or prohibit, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, by means of licenses or otherwise, any transactions in foreign exchange or in bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the United States and the export, hoarding, melting, or earmarkings of gold or silver coin or bullion or currency, transfers of credit in any form (other than credits relating solely to transactions to be executed wholly within the United States), and transfers of evidences of indebtedness or of the ownership of property between the United States and any foreign country, whether enemy, ally of enemy, or otherwise, or between residents of one or more foreign countries, by any person within the United States; and he may require any such person engaged in any such transaction to furnish, under oath, complete information relative thereto, including the production of any books of account, contracts, letters or other papers, in connection therewith in the custody or control of such person, either before or after such transaction is completed."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is to renumber sections 6 and 7 to correspond with the change just made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 22, after the words "note or notes," it is proposed to insert a comma.

Mr. POMERENE That is the amendment that I offer.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator from Ohio insist upon that amendment?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes, Mr. President; I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I hope that amendment will be voted down, because I think it will defeat in part the purpose of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. I join with the Senator from North Carolina in expressing the same hope.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I simply want to make this observation in passing:

A few years hence, when it comes to the readjustment of values, and these banks have loaned out 20 per cent of their paid-up capital and surplus to a number of their borrowers, and so forth, there will be a lot of bank failures; and I want to come to Senators and say, "I told you so."

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I will take the liberty of replying to that statement by saying that the only change in existing law that this bill as reported makes, as stated by the Senator from North Carolina, is to authorize a relaxation of this rule where the loan is made upon Government bonds or certificates of indebtedness; and when loans of that sort wreck banks in the United States, the United States will be out of business. The proposed amendment so as to include warehouse receipts based on staple products seems fully justified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I suggest an amendment for the special attention of the Senator from North Carolina. It is on line 19, page 5. I understand that the first committee amendment there has been disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All the committee amendments have been disposed of.

Mr. OWEN. On line 19, after the word "paper," I suggest the insertion of the words "of classes approved by the Federal Reserve Board," so that the sentence will read:

The discount of commercial or business paper of classes approved by the Federal Reserve Board actually owned by the person—

And so forth.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to that, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma proposes an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 19, after the words "business paper," it is proposed to insert "of classes approved by the Federal Reserve Board."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. Now, Mr. President, on line 18, after the word "values," I suggest the insertion of the words "or loans made on warehouse receipts." That will cover the point which the Senator from Arkansas was concerned with, about cotton then in the warehouse and on which loans may be made on warehouse receipts.

Mr. ROBINSON. It would include any kind of agricultural commodities—staple products.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 18, after the word "values," it is proposed to insert the words "or loans made on warehouse receipts."

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Oklahoma if he desires to open up to the banks the unlimited right to loan on any kind of warehouse receipts, without regard to the nature of the warehouse receipts, and not have it included within the 10 per cent?

Mr. OWEN. Oh, no; not at all. I will say to the Senator that the language "the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values," of course would be open to the same general objection that the Senator raises—that they might not be merchantable—but the banks do not deal in that kind of paper. Now, you take the wheat that would be sold in Liverpool, against which a bill of exchange is drawn, that same wheat would not be available if it were in storage in St. Paul. That was all that I wanted to cover.

Mr. KELLOGG. But the amendment would permit the bank to loan any amount beyond the 10 per cent.

Mr. OWEN. Existing law would do that, against existing values. The term "existing values" is broad enough to cover the Senator's objection.

Mr. KELLOGG. But the "existing values" only applies to bills of exchange.

Mr. OWEN. I know that.

Mr. KELLOGG. The words "existing values" would not apply to the warehouse receipts.

Mr. OWEN. It would if the product were stored anywhere.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am not so sure about that, the way the language would read.

Mr. OWEN. You can draw a bill of exchange against products in a warehouse anywhere.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is true.

Mr. OWEN. I only call the Senator's attention to the fact that the term "existing values" is very broad, and that these banks are under the regulations of the Comptroller of the Currency and the Federal Reserve Board. I have no objection to saying "on loans made on warehouse receipts of staple products."

Mr. ROBINSON. That is the proper language, I think—"staple agricultural products."

Mr. OWEN. "Staple products." It might be steel.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is all right.

Mr. OWEN. I offer that amendment, "of staple products," so as to read:

Or loans made on warehouse receipts of staple products.

That would cover the point that the Senator makes.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I should like to hear the whole amendment stated as now proposed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "values," on line 18, page 5, it is proposed to insert the words:

Or loans made on warehouse receipts of staple products—

So that the paragraph will read:

That (1) the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values or loans made on warehouse receipts of staple products, (2) the discount of commercial or business paper of classes approved by the Federal Reserve Board actually owned by the person, company, corporation, or firm negotiating the same.

Mr. KELLOGG. The suggestion I had to make to the Senator from Oklahoma as to the first subdivision, as amended, was simply this, that a bank could discount bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values.

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. And in addition to that it could loan on warehouse receipts of staple products, whether they were of the value pretended or not. The term "existing values" does not apply to the warehouse receipts as drawn. Now, of course, in the case of most warehouse receipts of staple products the banks would judge as to the value undoubtedly, and it may be perfectly safe, but a great many warehouse receipts are issued that are not good security.

Mr. OWEN. I will say to the Senator that one trouble with American banking is that it has not sufficiently recognized commodities as the basis of commercial value. In Europe they recognize that altogether, and a banker in Europe is acquainted with commercial values. They are expert in such values, and that is why in Europe the acceptances grew in such a large way to be the form in which the bankers' loans were really made.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me now for a statement supplementing his own?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Under the language of the latter part of this section no loan could be made in excess of that now authorized by law, namely, 10 per cent of the capital stock and surplus, unimpaired, except to the extent permitted by rules and regulations prescribed by the Comptroller of the Currency, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. That is thought to safeguard the matter amply. In addition to the wisdom which the banks themselves would exercise for their own protection, they must make these loans in excess of the one-tenth only under rules and regulations and to the extent permitted by these authorities.

Mr. KELLOGG. The last clause which was referred to by the Senator from Arkansas provides that—

The total liabilities to any association, of any person or of any company, corporation, or firm, upon any note or notes purchased or discounted by such association * * * shall not exceed—

Except in certain cases—

10 per cent of such capital stock and surplus.

Does that include loans made on warehouse receipts? It does not say so.

Mr. ROBINSON. It does not, but I have no objection to including them.

Mr. KELLOGG. Now, I just make this suggestion: Warehouse receipts on cotton, warehouse receipts on wheat, or perhaps iron or steel and some other products, if they are stored, are generally good; but there is a great fluctuation in the cotton market and in the other markets, and I suggest that we ought not to open the door to unlimited loans beyond the 10 per cent on warehouse receipts. It is a dangerous expedient.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma and the Senator from Minnesota both that, so far as I am concerned, there is no objection to making that limitation in the last clause apply to all three classes.

Mr. OWEN. I should be perfectly willing to do that, because I agree with the Senator that we ought at all times to safeguard our banking system most carefully.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think that limitation should apply to the warehouse receipts; in fact, to all three of those exceptions.

Mr. OWEN. I think, then, the language could be modified——

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; by another amendment striking out a portion of this language on page 6.

Mr. OWEN. That language on line 5, page 6, after the words "shall not exceed," could be amended by inserting "in the three classes above referred to."

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; or the language could be made to read in this way:

But the total liabilities to any association of any person or of any company, corporation, or firm, shall not exceed—

And so forth, quoting the rest of the language and striking out all after the comma on line 2 down to and including the comma on line 4 after the word "indebtedness." That would simply bring all three of these classes or exceptions under the rule that is provided, namely, supervision by the Comptroller of the Currency and the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator please state that again?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. If the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] is agreed to there would be no objection, so far as I can see, to the following amendment:

Strike out all language in the bill on page 6 commencing at the word "upon," in line 2, down to and including the word "indebtedness," in line 4, so that it will read:

But the total liabilities to any association, of any person, or of any company, corporation, or firm shall not exceed (except to the extent permitted by rules and regulations prescribed by the Comptroller of the Currency, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury) 10 per cent of such capital stock and surplus fund of such association.

The effect of that amendment would be to bring all three of the classes within the rule laid down in the parentheses, namely, that the rule limiting the loans to 10 per cent should not be relaxed except to the extent permitted by rules and regulations prescribed by the Comptroller of the Currency and the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. OWEN. I think that would cover it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas a question. The Senator is well aware of the system in vogue in the South with reference to moving the cotton crop. How would this amendment affect that? I know that frequently bills of exchange are drawn on shipments of cotton that probably exceed the capital stock of the bank itself.

Mr. ROBINSON. I discussed that matter at length awhile ago.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I heard the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. And that condition is the justification of the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. He has offered an amendment including in this excepted class loans upon warehouse receipts when secured by staple agricultural products. If that amendment goes in the bill I have no objection to authorizing the Comptroller of the Currency and the Secretary of the Treasury to prescribe rules and regulations fixing the extent to which such loans may be made, because these are national banks and they do that anyway.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think it is prudent to do that; but it would be very unfortunate unless the latitude were given to the banks.

Mr. ROBINSON. The banks now feel that they are exercising these powers under doubtful authority.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I rather think so myself.

Mr. ROBINSON. And, in fact, many of them think they are violating the law as construed heretofore, and I think there would be no objection to adjusting the matter in that way.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I think that instead of striking out the words "upon any note or notes purchased," and so forth, and leaving nothing in lieu of it, it should read "upon any such bills of exchange, loans, or notes," so as to cover it.

Mr. ROBINSON. "Or warehouse receipts."

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no objection to repeating it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think that would be very much better. Will the Senator fix the amendment and offer it in that form?

Mr. OWEN. Will the Secretary take the amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. We can not do business in this way. We can not consider two amendments at once. The Secretary will state the amendment on page 5.

The SECRETARY. After the word "values," on page 5, line 18, it is proposed to insert "or loans made on warehouse receipts of staple products."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. On page 6, I move to strike out the words "any note or notes purchased or discounted by such association and secured by such bonds or certificates of indebtedness," and insert "such discounts, loans, or notes."

Mr. ROBINSON. "Bills of exchange and warehouse receipts."

Mr. OWEN. It is a discount of bills of exchange. "Discounts" will cover that.

Mr. ROBINSON. All right.

Mr. OWEN. "Such discounts, loans, or notes"; that would cover it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. PENROSE, and Mr. LODGE conferees on the part of the Senate.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. OWEN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11283) to amend and reenact sections 4, 11, 16, 19, and 22 of the act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act, and sections 5208 and 5209, Revised Statutes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5.

That the Senate recede from its amendment to the title.

ROBERT L. OWEN,
ATLEE POMERENE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

CARTER GLASS,
MICHAEL T. PHELAN,
E. A. HAYES,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if there is no further business to be transacted at this time, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, September 19, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate September 18, 1918.

ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL.

Claude R. Porter to be Assistant Attorney General.

MEMBER OF UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION.

Edward P. Costigan to be a member of the United States Tariff Commission.

POSTMASTER.

MICHIGAN.

John E. Shekell, Jackson.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, September 18, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Edwin Cunningham, pastor of the Church of the Messiah, First Universalist, of Binghamton, N. Y., offered the following prayer:

Holy Lord, Father of all mercy, grant, we beseech Thee, upon the Members of this House Thy guidance as they labor here so arduously in these days of war. We pray Thee, O God, that the Speaker and every Member of this House may so act and so think, this and every day, that they shall discover Thee to be a fellow Speaker, a fellow Member, a fellow Friend, comforting, counseling, encouraging, and guiding them. Bless with Thy loving consideration the deliberations of this day, and in return for their labors grant to them the love of their countrymen and that peace of heart which passeth all understanding that Thou alone canst give. In the spirit of Jesus, whom we love, we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

APPOINTMENTS UNDER THE JUDGE ADVOCATE.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes, to read two letters.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, what are the letters about?

Mr. SNYDER. A letter that I wrote to the Judge Advocate General with regard to a man, and the reply thereto.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER. These letters are as follows:

SEPTEMBER 9, 1918.

The JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL, U. S. A.,
War Department, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am inclosing herewith application of Hon. F. W. Cristman, of Herkimer, N. Y., one of the best attorneys in my section of the State and a man of very high reputation, for a commission in your service.

Mr. Cristman submits to you his record, military and civilian, which, I believe, shows that he would be thoroughly qualified for a commission in your department, and I can vouch for him in every way. He can secure any number of indorsements if needed, and, if you desired it, he would gladly come to Washington for a personal interview. He is 49 years of age, in perfect health and physical condition, and fully able to devote his entire mental and physical ability to the service in some position where his talent might be taken advantage of.

I trust you may look upon the application with favor, and can assure you that Mr. Cristman will measure up to all requirements.

With thanks for your attention, I remain,

Very truly, yours, HOMER P. SNYDER.

To which I got the following reply:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, September 12, 1918.

Hon. HOMER P. SNYDER,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SNYDER: This office is in receipt of your communication concerning Hon. F. W. Cristman, of Herkimer, N. Y., who seeks a commission in this department.

Replying thereto, permit me to say that the department, upon thorough consideration and in the light of its experience, has found it necessary in the interests of the military service to inaugurate a different method of selecting officers for this branch of the service. The department has undertaken, after a thorough investigation through its own representatives, who will get into personal and confidential touch with the best professional sources of information, to assemble thus upon its own initiative a list of those lawyers from the country at large and from those already in the Army who, as a result of such investigation, are deemed best qualified for the service, and from such list all appointments to this department will hereafter be made.

Obviously, under such a system of selection applications for appointment to this department must be without influence or effect. Accordingly I have the honor to advise you that hereafter they can not be entertained.

Very truly, yours, S. T. ANSELL,
Acting Judge Advocate General.

Now, I maintain that my letter carried no suggestion of influence whatever and that the letter that I received in return shows in one paragraph that appointments have been made under influence and that at the present time that situation has been discontinued. [Applause.]

REVENUE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the revenue bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 12863.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 301. That in lieu of the tax imposed by Title II of the revenue act of 1917, but in addition to the other taxes imposed by this act, there shall (except as otherwise provided in section 303) be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every corporation, a tax computed according to whichever of the two following methods yields the higher amount of tax in the case of such corporation: (a) The war-profits method specified in Part III of this title, or (b) the excess-profits method specified in Part IV of this title.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question. I notice two proposals here, one to collect under a war-profits scheme and one under an excess-profits scheme, the one to be selected which will yield the greatest amount of revenue. I want to inquire of the gentleman from North Carolina if the right to adopt these alternative methods of collection does not in a large sense discriminate against the man in business who was not very successful during the prewar period and discriminate in favor of the man who was exceedingly successful during the prewar period?

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman is right as far as the amount of the tax is concerned. The corporation that was not so successful before the war as it has been since the war will pay more tax than the corporation that was successful before the war and equally successful since the war, for the reason that the former would come under the war-profits scheme of computation and the latter would come under the excess-profits tax. But the reason for that is that the war-profits tax simply taxes the profits made over and above those made before the war. Therefore it is called a war-profits tax, and every dollar of that tax is bound to be paid out of the extra profit that the corporation has been making since the war, while the other corporation, that was making, say, 20 per cent before the war and is now making 20 per cent on the same capital, is making only its normal profit, and according to the face of the returns has not benefited by the war. Therefore its tax is somewhat lower, because it will fall under the excess-profits tax.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I suggest to the gentleman, with the permission of the gentleman from Illinois, that if there is any discrimination it will not be in the case of any corporation earning less than 10 per cent.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That much is looked after.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. In other words, the war-profits tax allows the corporation that was making a lower rate of profit before the war at least 10 per cent on its total capital invested during the taxable year, while the other corporation taxed under the excess-profits tax method is allowed only an 8 per cent deduction. The reason for that is that the war-profits tax is 80 per cent over and above the 10 per cent, while the excess-profits tax is a graduated tax. In any event, in 19 cases out of 20 the corporation that falls under the excess-profits tax computation method pays a less tax than the corporation making the same profit and earnings that falls under the war-profits tax. But we guarantee them a profit of 10 per cent before levying the war-profits tax.

Mr. MADDEN. What I am afraid of is that this bill will compel the man who was the more successful to pay less and will penalize the man who was not so successful before the war.

Mr. KITCHIN. In a way there will be a difference, as the gentleman suggests, but this is the reason why the committee insisted, over the protest of the Treasury Department, on increasing the excess-profits rate: If we had not done so there would have been a discrimination against the concern that was unsuccessful before the war, which would have been twice as great as it is now.

Mr. MADDEN. It seems to me that the man who is best able to pay ought to pay.

Mr. KITCHIN. That has been my thought, too.

Mr. MADDEN. But this does not look as though it was going to carry out that principle.

Mr. KITCHIN. It is not based exactly on ability to pay, but upon ability to pay on the profits made during the war over and above those made before the war.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, the committee have given a good deal more consideration to it than I have, and I accept the wisdom of their judgment; but, looking at it after a cursory study of the question, I could not help but conclude that the man best qualified to pay was being favored, while the man less qualified to pay was discriminated against.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. My purpose is to continue the thought advanced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. I am acquainted with corporations organized in 1910 where their profits were very small during the organization period; they will be necessarily obliged to pay 80 per cent after being allowed 10 per cent on the invested capital. Now, I wish to inquire why the committee penalize in a way the corporation that was formed during the prewar period by compelling them to pay 80 per cent, and yet the corporation that was making a fair return during the prewar period gets the benefit and is only obliged to pay 70 per cent on a profit above 20 per cent of its capital? You give a preference in this bill in the excess-profits tax to the established corporation which was making a large profit during the prewar period, allowing it to take the benefit, whereas you penalize the newly organized corporation by allowing it only 10 per cent of its invested capital before applying the 80 per cent tax. Why does the committee distinguish in these particulars?

And if the Chairman will permit me a further statement, the charts which were exhibited of the workings of the two taxes, prepared by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY], show beyond doubt that the established corporation is going to get the benefit under the war-profits tax and the new corporation will be penalized in every instance where he would only be allowed 10 per cent on the invested capital and pay 80 per cent on the remainder.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is right, to a certain extent. The corporation that was just being organized and getting on its feet and made a great deal less than 10 per cent on its capital invested will only be entitled to a 10 per cent exemption.

Mr. STAFFORD. Nine and a half or nine and three-quarters; he would only get 10 per cent.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say that three-quarters of the industrial corporations did not make 10 per cent on the capital invested through the prewar period, and by giving them 10 per cent deduction it is a great help to those corporations, for the reason that if this bill provided a strictly distinctive war-profits tax on them and stopped there, the corporation that was making 4 per cent, or $4,000 on each $100,000, would only have that deduction, while we wanted to help that corporation and not let the 80 per cent tax fall so heavily on it. So we gave it a $10,000 deduction before the 80 per cent attaches.

I admit that the matter troubled the committee, and that it troubled me. We knew that the suggestions made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] would be made. Many other nations have a similar war-profits tax. Under a strict war-profits tax taxpayers are only allowed to deduct the earnings they were making before the war from what they are making now, and then the war-profits tax is levied on the difference between the income of the taxable year and the prewar income. We do more; we allow a greater deduction and a greater assurance of return on the capital before the 80 per cent attaches than does any other country in the world.

The Secretary of the Treasury and the public demanded that we should not only levy the excess-profits taxes, but a war-profits tax, and in that way secure a large part of these taxes to help support the war from the profits made, as they claim, because of the war; or, as I put it, made during the war.

We are not doing a great injustice to them if we are permitting them to have not only the amount of the earnings made before the war but a deduction in all cases equal to 10 per cent of their invested capital. Under the war-profits tax, to which the gentleman's objections are made, we are sure that every dollar of the tax that will be collected under this tax will be out of profits made over and above the profits they were making before the war and over and above the 10 per cent deduction we give, so that every dollar will be war profits, while, on the other hand, excess-profits taxes will not be war-profit taxes, because they will be levied on the ability to pay. The corporation that was making $20,000 on each $100,000 before the war and now is making $20,000 on each $100,000 can not be said to be making money out of the war, or because of the war, because if we had had no war they would still be making the $20,000.

Now, we can not apply a war-profits tax to that concern, because it is not making a war profit. Such a concern will be taxed under the excess-profits tax, and we have greatly increased the excess-profits tax over the existing rate. The Secretary of the Treasury and a great many economists and business men of the country contended that we ought not to increase the excess-profits tax rate at all. If we had not done it, there would have been a greater discrimination. We have, however, greatly increased the excess-profits tax over the tax levied last year.

Mr. STAFFORD. But you are penalizing the new corporation that was not organized during the prewar period as compared with a corporation that was already established and earning a fair normal profit, based on the business of an established concern, by taxing the new concern 80 per cent, whereas you only tax the old concern less than 70 per cent, perhaps 50 per cent on an average, when they pay the highest rate.

Mr. KITCHIN. But the concern taxed under the war-profits tax is making more, and we allow them a deduction of more than they were making.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is making more because it was not established, and you are penalizing that concern, making no provision for that concern, but penalizing it as compared with an established concern. Take the Ford Motor Co. The Ford Motor Co. will pay under the excess-profits tax and they will get the benefit of all of the millions that they made during the prewar period, because it was established, while another truck company established not during the prewar period, or established then, which was making only perhaps 5 per cent on invested capital, will be obliged to pay 80 per cent. Why should not the Ford Co. pay 80 per cent? The mere fact that it has been established is no reason why they should be given preference as against a competitor which was established since the prewar period.

Mr. KITCHIN. The Ford Motor Co. is not making war profits and the other concern is, and in order to help the other concern, that was doing a very poor business before the war, we are giving him a deduction of 10 per cent.

Mr. STAFFORD. But it was just organized; it was not doing business before the war.

Mr. KITCHIN. In other words, the principle of this is that the Ford Co. is getting no profits out of the war and the other man is.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, the Ford Motor Co. is getting profits out of the war.

Mr. KITCHIN. It is making the same profits now that it was before; no more.

Mr. STAFFORD. They are using their plant, which was established in the prewar period, for war purposes; but a plant that was not established during the prewar period did not have an opportunity to make profits, and you are penalizing that corporation in competition with an established corporation.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman say that the Ford Motor Co. is making more money during the war? If the Ford Motor Co. is making more money on capital invested now, during the war, than before the war, it will pay the 80 per cent, because it would be war profits.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; it would pay under the excess-profits tax.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no.

Mr. STAFFORD. Because it would get the benefit of deductions under the excess-profits tax.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say to the gentleman and to the House that the gentleman states the Ford Motor Co. are making substantially more profits now on capital invested than before the war, and if that be true the Ford Motor Co. will fall under the war-profits tax.

Mr. STAFFORD. Suppose it is just making as much as it did prior to the war?

Mr. KITCHIN. And if it is not making more profits out of the war on capital invested than before, then the Ford Motor Co. is not making war profits—profits out of the war. The country demands that we shall have a war-profits tax, a tax to get money out of the profits made since the war and because of the war, this is the only way that we can do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is making war profits, because it is utilizing the plant that was established during the prewar period—utilizing it then for profits other than those pertaining to war, and now utilizing it for war purposes exclusively. To that extent it has an advantage over the plant that was not established during the prewar period. You are penalizing the latter concern by levying an 80 per cent tax, while the Ford Co. escapes with an average of perhaps 50 per cent.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman has very courteously asked me some questions, and I have answered them the best I could. Now let me ask the gentleman a question. Is the gentleman in favor of levying a war-profits tax to help win this war? Answer that yes or no.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am in favor of levying a war-profits tax, but I want that levied generally on all corporations, so that the corporation that was well established and a going concern during the prewar period will not be given a preference and an advantage over the corporation that was not established during the prewar period.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman says, in direct answer, "yes," and in his explanation he says "no," that he is in favor of an excess-profits tax. If you have a war-profits tax, then you are bound to levy a tax upon the profits made during the war or out of the war over and above the profits made in the prewar period. The whole argument of the gentleman is that he is opposed to a war-profits tax, but wants an excess-profits tax to apply to all, whether they are making money out of the war or making no money out of the war.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman by this bill is giving a preference under the excess-profits tax, only levying about 50 per cent, whereas upon a corporation that was not established during the prewar period you are levying 80 per cent. I am in favor of equality to all, based on the profits that they are earning to-day. No one can deny that the Ford Co. is making millions of dollars out of the war, and they will not pay under the war-profits tax, but will pay under the reduced excess-profits tax.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not believe I can make the gentleman understand me. If the Ford Co. is making millions on the war over and above what they were making on invested capital——

Mr. STAFFORD. Not over and above, but the equal of what he was making in the prewar period.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me ask the gentleman one more question.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from North Carolina permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; if the gentleman from Wisconsin will yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Did not the committee have information that the Ford Co. was making less money now than it did before the war?

Mr. KITCHIN. On capital invested, yes; and therefore we raised the rate to practically double his tax of last year. Let me say to the gentleman that if we levied a strictly war-profits tax the Ford Co. would not pay a penny, the Eastman Kodak Co. would not pay a penny, the Liggett & Meyers Tobacco Co. would not pay a penny, and there are thousands of the richest corporations in the country that would not pay a penny under a war-profits tax. Therefore we had to levy an excess-profits tax to catch those gentlemen.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman contend that the Ford Motor Co. will not make more than 10 per cent upon their invested capital?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, the Ford Motor Co. are making over 50 per cent, and were before the war.

Mr. STAFFORD. Everyone in Detroit knows that the Ford Co. is going to make more than 10 per cent upon their invested capital.

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course. They will make 40 or 50 per cent, but they made that before the war, and if we did not have this excess-profits tax they would not pay a penny; but let me ask the gentleman another question. He has answered both yes and no.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; the gentleman is putting words in my mouth; I answered yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Is the gentleman in favor instead of having a graduated excess-profits tax rate from 35, 50, and 70, to make that 80 per cent?

Mr. STAFFORD. I favor making the highest rate the same in both instances. If you levy 80 per cent under the war-profits tax you should levy it under the excess-profits tax——

Mr. KITCHIN. A flat 80 per cent?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; graduated.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman would have the same discrimination, then, exactly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why do you make it 70 per cent on excess profits and 80 per cent on war profits? The gentleman has not yet explained that.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have explained that one is a war profits tax and the other is a tax on profits——

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a flat discrimination in favor of the established corporation that was making exorbitant profits during the prewar period.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 303. That in the case of a corporation the earnings of which are to be ascribed primarily to the activities of the principal owners or stockholders who are themselves regularly engaged in the active conduct of the affairs of the corporation, and in which capital (whether invested, borrowed, rented, or otherwise secured) is not directly or indirectly a material income-producing factor, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon its net income (in lieu of the tax imposed by Title II of the revenue act of 1917 and in lieu of the tax imposed by section 301 of this act, but in addition to the other taxes imposed by this act) a tax of 20 per cent of the amount of its net income in excess of $3,000. A foreign corporation shall not be entitled to the specific exemption of $3,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the chairman of the committee be kind enough to give an instance of the character of corporations that would be qualified as stated in section 303?

Mr. KITCHIN. An insurance agency that writes insurance on commissions and requires no capital; a corporation of architects, which require no capital; a lawyers' guaranty title company that looks up titles and requires no capital; any company where the earnings may be ascribed primarily to personal services and in which capital is not a material income-producing factor.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where the capital is nominal?

Mr. KITCHIN. Where it is not actually required—where the business does not require them to have capital.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee with reference to the word "corporation," in line 6, whether it would include a partnership or a joint association?

Mr. KITCHIN. The excess-profits and war-profits tax does not apply to partnerships or individuals.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. My sole purpose was in making a beneficial correction of this section, and this thought presents itself: Here is a corporation, the membership of which are devoting their entire time to the activities of the corporation. Now, under the provisions of the bill as it now stands they are taxed, but if the same concern were operated not as a corporation, but as a partnership or a joint company, they would not be taxed.

Mr. KITCHIN. The stockholders who are carrying on a business as managers and giving their personal services are entitled to a reasonable compensation for their personal services, while in a corporation, a copartnership, they are not; so they even up from that angle.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Is the proposition covered in any other section of title 3; or where is it covered?

Mr. KITCHIN. In the deductions provision, page 36, paragraph 1, a reasonable allowance for salaries is allowed corporations.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In any case where the full amount of the credit is not allowed under the first bracket above provided, by reason of the fact that such credit is in excess of 15 per cent of the invested capital, the part not so allowed shall be deducted from the amount in the next succeeding bracket, and if not then fully allowed the remaining part shall be deducted from the amount in the last bracket.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. In the event that a corporation gets its deduction of $3,000 and 8 per cent and the deduction runs it into the 70 per cent bracket, will they pay 70 per cent on the balance?

Mr. KITCHIN. On the balance, yes. In other words, the corporation must have the entire 8 per cent deduction upon the capital invested and the $3,000 before any of its income becomes subject to tax.

Under existing law it is found that some corporations of small capital would not be able to take their entire credit out under the first bracket. The bill provides that in such cases where the full amount of the credit can not be allowed in the first bracket by reason of the fact that such credit is in excess of 15 per cent of the invested capital the part not so allowed shall be deducted from the amount in the next succeeding bracket, and if not then fully allowed the remaining part shall be deducted in the last bracket.

Mr. BLACK. But then he could not drop back and take the 35 per cent rate; he starts at the 70 per cent rate.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman is correct, if his deduction is in excess of 20 per cent of his invested capital.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman, I wish to inquire what the word "bracket" means in this paragraph.

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, it means the different rates. Under the rules and regulations of the Treasury Department, as for instance line 4, "35 per cent of the amount of net income," and so forth, is a bracket. Then in line 8, "50 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the 15 per cent," and so forth, is a bracket. Those are known as brackets.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Ought not the word "bracket" to be replaced by some other word?

Mr. KITCHIN. As I understand, all legislative language uses the word "brackets" to describe the different rates. We use the word "bracket" in speaking of the income surtax rates, and the Treasury Department has used the term in its ruling, which appears on page 58, from line 13 to line 19. This is the very language of the ruling and it is very proper.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Well, passing that, as I read this section, there is no other allowance made over the $3,000 specific exemption similar to 10 per cent on invested capital allowed in computing war-tax profits?

Mr. KITCHIN. Both have $3,000 exemption. In this excess-profis tax method the bill provides an 8 per cent deduction on capital invested during the taxable year, plus $3.000.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit another question? This bracket, "35 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the excess-profits credit (determined under section 316) and not in excess of 15 per cent of the invested capital for the taxable year," in the report which your committee made, you seem to indicate that the deductions allowed are taken first from the income, and the reading of this paragraph would indicate that the deductions are not allowed but held, as it were, in suspension until the ascertaining of what the per cent of net income is which is less than 15 per cent on the capital?

Mr. KITCHIN. It is 35 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the excess-profits credit, and now the excess-profits credit is 8 per cent of the capital invested plus $3,000. Take $100.000 invested capital. Eight per cent would be $8,000 plus $3,000, making $11,000. Fifteen per cent of the invested capital would be $15.000. Now, 35 per cent of the net income in excess of the credit and not in excess of 15 per cent on invested capital would be 35 per cent on the amount in excess of $11,000 and not in excess of $15,000, or 35 per cent of $4,000.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. My point of inquiry is directed to ascertaining whether or not you find the net profit first, then do you deduct the exemption from the net profit, and then apply your 35 per cent and your 50 per cent and 70 per cent?

Mr. KITCHIN. We do not carry it in each bracket; no.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. In the report which the committee makes they say that the entire credits are first deducted, and, therefore, reading the text of the bill, I could not see how there was to be a suspended credit that was to be applied in each bracket to cover any excess.

Mr. KITCHIN. The report might have misled you. It would not be a suspended credit. You get your credit by first setting that aside. Then the different brackets attach to the excess over the credit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 316. That the excess-profits credit shall consist of a specific exemption of $3,000 plus an amount equal to 8 per cent of the invested capital for the taxable year.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma: Page 58, line 22, after the word "year," insert the following: "Provided, That in the case of mines, oil and gas wells the excess-profit credit shall consist of a specific exemption of $3,000, plus an amount not less than 10 or more than 25 per cent of invested capital, such percentage credit to be determined in each case by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe."

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, this amendment means that such corporations as undertake mining and the production of oil and gas shall be permitted a greater exemption, to be determined in each case by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. In other words, instead of holding them down to a set rule, it would give the Commissioner of Internal Revenue latitude, so that if a corporation enters into some very hazardous undertaking they would have a greater exemption than one that does not enter upon a hazardous venture. I think the amendment should be adopted, and that these corporations of that character should be protected.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman will find that the subject of oil and gas wells and mines is in clause 9, page 38. I hope the gentleman's amendment will be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CHANDLER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A foreign corporation shall not be entitled to the specific exemption of $3.000.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

On yesterday I had occasion to offer an amendment to the bill, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] made an entirely unprovoked attack upon me, questioning my motives in offering the amendment, and I wish to make this statement in regard to it:

On page 10425 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, after having alleged that this amendment was offered by me in a jocular frame of mind and was of a trifling nature, he went on to say that I was "trying to play peanut politics, thinking I could get some votes from the students at Harvard by the introduction of an amendment like this, and that this was no place or time for politics."

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that there was no intention on my part to play politics, and I certainly would consider it almost a crime in this great crisis to try to play politics or to offer an amendment in the interest of any particular district or section of the people at the expense of any other district or section. Never since I have been a Member of this House have I been guilty of any such conduct.

In regard to the Harvard College part of it, the only reference that I made to Harvard College was to the fact that I had been familiar in my college days, when I was working my way through Harvard, with the Harvard Cooperative Society, and therefore, in reply to the question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON], I stated what the membership requirement was in that society, namely, a small annual admission fee. Now, in regard to trying to get votes from Harvard students: In the first place, Harvard students do not have a vote in Cambridge unless their parents live there; in the second place, practically all the students that are of voting age are now away from Cambridge in the service of their country; and, in the third place, the Harvard Cooperative Society could not qualify for exemption under my amendment the way it is being conducted to-day, as it has capital stock and does make profit from those outside of its membership.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. DALLINGER. In just a minute.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is one other thing which I want to call to the attention of the committee and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], because it is something that the gentleman from Illinois did not know when he made his remarks yesterday. I appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means yesterday morning and saw the chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], and he suggested that if I were willing to limit my amendment to students at educational institutions the committee might consider it favorably, and my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] intimated the same thing in his speech yesterday. I told the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means that I did not want to have the exemption limited to college students; that if it did not apply to all cooperative stores organized under the Rochdale system, whether by farmers, by laboring men, or by anybody else throughout the country, I did not want the amendment. And throughout my remarks upon this amendment I pointed out that all I desired was to have the law made clear that these cooperative-store societies, organized for mutual purposes and without profit, should be exempt from taxation precisely the same as cooperative banks and building and loan associations and as mutual fire insurance companies are exempted in a later provision of the bill.

Now, I understand that there has been a ruling of the Treasury Department that these cooperative stores are not subject to the tax upon the profits that are returned to the members, but there is nothing in the act specifically about it, and that ruling may be changed to-morrow. A new Commissioner of Internal Revenue may make a different ruling. That is the reason I offered the amendment in good faith, because if there are to be exemptions made I felt that the cooperative-store societies are upon exactly the same basis as these other associations which the committee has exempted.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I offered my amendment and the amendment was defeated in the committee, and that is the end of it. The Committee on Ways and Means treated me most courteously; they gave me a fair hearing, and they finally, after careful consideration, took the ground that they were not willing to favor any further exemptions in the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing to abide by the result, but I do resent the statement that in this great crisis in our country's history I have been playing politics or trying to do anything in the interest of any corporation in my district or in the interest of any one class of people as distinguished from any other class in the community. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as this matter has all had reference to me, I think I ought to have a chance to make a reply to it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Later it can be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks for recognition as a member of the committee.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Ways and Means had no thought that the gentleman's amendment was presented for any political purpose. On the contrary, so far as I myself am concerned, and, I think, other members of the committee, we thought that the gentleman's amendment had considerable merit to it and gave very careful consideration. The difficulty we found with it was that it was hard to prepare a provision that would not reach further than the gentleman himself would desire in the way of exemption. That was all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(b) For the purposes of this title, the par value of stock or shares shall, in the case of stock or shares having no par value, be deemed to be the fair market value as of the date or dates of issue of such stock or shares.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to pass this over, with the privilege to the committee to return to it later.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to pass over this passage for the present, with the right on the part of the committee to return to the same. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

If such predecessor trade or business was carried on by a partnership or individual the net income for the prewar period shall be ascertained and returned upon the same basis and in the same manner as provided for income-tax purposes in Title II, except that the credits provided in subdivisions (b) and (c) of section 216 shall be deducted.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to make a typographical correction of the text.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 66, line 13, strike out the words and letter "(b) and (c)" and insert "(a) and (b)."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 401. That (in lieu of the tax imposed by Title II of the revenue act of 1916, as amended, and in lieu of the tax imposed by Title IX of the revenue act of 1917) a tax equal to the sum of the following percentages of the value of the net estate (determined as provided in section 403) is hereby imposed upon the transfer of the net estate of every decedent dying after the passage of this act, whether a resident or nonresident of the United States:

3 per cent of the amount of the net estate not in excess of $50,000;

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like to inquire of the chairman what is the meaning of the words "net estate";

Mr. KITCHIN. "Net estate" means what is left after deducting all liabilities and debts and cost of administration, plus $50,000 exemption. It is defined in section 403.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is after the deductions on the settlement of the estate?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

6 per cent of the amount by which the net estate exceeds $50,000 and does not exceed $150,000;
9 per cent of the amount by which the net estate exceeds $150,000 and does not exceed $250,000;
12 per cent of the amount by which the net estate exceeds $250,000 and does not exceed $450,000;
15 per cent of the amount by which the net estate exceeds $450,000 and does not exceed $1,000,000;
18 per cent of the amount by which the net estate exceeds $1,000,000 and does not exceed $2,000,000;
21 per cent of the amount by which the net estate exceeds $2,000,000 and does not exceed $3,000,000;
24 per cent of the amount by which the net estate exceeds $3,000,000 and does not exceed $4,000,000;
27 per cent of the amount by which the net estate exceeds $4,000,000 and does not exceed $5,000,000;
30 per cent of the amount by which the net estate exceeds $5,000,000 and does not exceed $8,000,000;
35 per cent of the amount by which the net estate exceeds $8,000,000 and does not exceed $10,000,000; and 40 per cent of the amount by which the net estate exceeds $10,000,000.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MERRITT: Page 69, line 3, strike out the figure "3" and insert "one-half of one"; line 5, strike out the figure "6" and insert the word "one"; line 7, strike out the figure "9" and insert the words "one and one-half"; line 9, strike out the figures "12" and insert the word "two"; line 11, strike out the figures "15" and insert the words "two and one-half"; line 13, strike out the figures "18" and insert the word "three"; line 15, strike out the figures "21" and insert the words "three and one-half"; line 17, strike out the figures "24" and insert the word "four"; line 19, strike out the figures "27" and insert the words "four and one-half"; line 21, strike out the figures "30" and insert the word "five"; line 23, strike out the figures "35" and insert the word "seven"; line 25, strike out the figures "40" and insert the word "ten."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that we have passed these paragraphs and that the only paragraph to which an amendment is now in order is the one for the 40 per cent, in line 25.

Mr. MERRITT. I assumed that the whole section was a paragraph.

Mr. KITCHIN. We are reading the bill by paragraphs. However, I will reserve the point of order, so that the gentleman can go ahead.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina reserves the point of order.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, the committee will probably observe that my amendment is intended to continue the rates carried in the bill of 1917. I do that not because I think the estate tax ought to be in the bill at all, for I believe that the estate tax should legally and equitably be a State tax. Every decedent gets the right to will his property by the statute of a State. As I understand the lawyers, he does not have it under the common law, but as a matter of State statute. But as this estate tax has been carried in previous bills, it seems to me that the rate should be, in a proper sense, a tax and not a confiscation. In the rates in this bill the committee have passed the point of a tax and have got to the point of confiscation. When you get to the great estates and take 40 per cent as a United States tax, and take the great taxes which all the States now levy, you are fast getting to the point where you are going to say that no great accumulation of property can be made in this country. When you do that you are going beyond socialism and getting into anarchy and bolshevikism. If any man here thinks that any such policy as that is going to inure to the benefit of this country and is going to inspire the brains and energies of the people for the benefit not only of themselves but of the whole people, I think he is very much mistaken. It is by individual initiative which has produced the success of individuals and corporations that the great prosperity of this country has been built up, and I do not believe that by any such confiscatory action as is proposed in this bill you are going to help this country, either now or hereafter. I should like very much, therefore, to see these rates placed upon a tax basis instead of upon a basis of confiscation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina insist on his point of order?

Mr. KITCHIN. I withdraw the point of order. Let us take a vote on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whoever fails to comply with any duty imposed upon him by section 404, or, having in his possession or control any record, file, or paper, containing or supposed to contain any information concerning the estate of the decedent, or, having in his possesion or control any property comprised in the gross estate of the decedent, fails to exhibit the same upon request to the commissioner or any collector or law officer of the United States, or his duly authorized deputy or agent, who desires to examine the same in the performance of his duties under this title, shall be liable to a penalty of not exceeding $500, to be recovered, with costs of suit, in a civil action in the name of the United States.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return later to the end of this title for the purpose of offering an amendment which I desire to submit to the committee tomorrow, in reference to the estates of soldiers killed in action.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that he may hereafter return to the paragraph just read for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. TREADWAY. Not to the entire title, but to the end of the title.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand the gentleman desires to add another section?

Mr. TREADWAY. To add another section.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have no objection to that consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to return to the end of this title for the purpose of offering an amendment as another section.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Reserving the right to object, I understand this right to return is limited to the gentleman's amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of the internal-revenue tax now imposed thereon by law there shall be levied and collected upon all perfumes hereafter imported into the United States containing distilled spirits a tax of $3.30 per wine gallon and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such wine gallon. Such tax shall be collected by the colector of customs and deposited as internal-revenue collections, under such rules and regulations as the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may prescribe.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I shall vote for the pending revenue measure.

While I do not believe that the bill in its present form represents the acme of legislative wisdom, and while it unquestionably contains many inequities and inequalities, yet I appreciate the fact that the committee has done the very best that could be done under the abnormal conditions in which our country finds itself to-day.

From my standpoint, this bill is essentially a war measure, and because of that fact I shall not hesitate to vote in favor of its passage.

When, on April 6, 1917, the Congress decided that a state of war existed between this country and the Imperial Government of Germany, there were those among us who thought that, while the causes were more than sufficient for us to take so important a stand, that we should first attain a greater degree of preparedness. Others among us thought that war should have been declared immediately after the sinking of the Lusitania, and that when we failed to take this stand at that time we should have then and there immediately begun to prepare, because in all probability further depredations would follow.

Before the declaration of war I, together with many other Members of this body, voted for an increase in our Army and Navy, knowing full well that war was bound to come to us and wanting and advocating a state of real preparedness.

In the light of more recent events the wisdom and foresight of those who voted for these measures must be recognized.

There are those who judge a man's courage by his eagerness to get into a fight, regardless of how he conducts himself after he gets in.

There are times when one's eagerness must give way to his judgment, and there are none among us but will agree that the necessity for a better state of preparedness existed at that time and that the fact that we did not at that time make preparations must now be admitted by all to have been a serious mistake.

The cost to us because of the failure to take cognizance of these self-evident conditions has been tremendous. It has taken more than a year to organize our war machinery and munition factories and to reorganize our private business enterprises on a war basis, which we have since found so necessary and the lack of which has been so serious.

War became a reality for us on April 6, 1917, and from that day debate on that issue was no longer in order. The great question then became how to prosecute the war to a successful conclusion, that the people of the earth might live in peace with each other, and the hand of the autocrat and militarist be forever made impotent.

The patriotic people of this country recognize and realize that legislation of this kind is necessary and inevitable, and are reconciled to it. They realize, as we must realize, that this is no time for compromise or indecision, and they look to us to pass legislation of this kind without delay.

This is not a partisan question, and politics should be adjourned.

We can debate the various features of this complicated measure until the next new moon and be no closer to satisfying ourselves as to all its provisions than we are at this moment.

Delay spells danger, and this bill must pass quickly and with no material modification.

The urgency of this measure is unquestioned, and to drag it on indefinitely with unlimited debate will avail us nothing and will get us nowhere. I repeat, this measure must pass, and pass speedily.

A million heroes on the bloody fields of France, and 14,000,000 draftees, together with millions of aching hearts, demand it.

The people of my great State, which gave us Lincoln and Grant, Douglas and Logan, and other great men without number, and which this year celebrates the one hundredth anniversary of its admission as the twenty-first sovereign State to this glorious Union, are in favor of any measure that will bring this terrible conflict to a speedy and successful conclusion, and that will furnish the necessary funds to properly care for the heroes at the front and those men, with the hearts of heroes, to be trained on this side.

Illinois realizes the necessity of this measure and, if left to a vote of its people, would be for it, just as I know that every State in this Union would be for it.

As a Representative of that great State it has been my privilege since our entry into this conflict to assist in doing everything humanly possible to bring this country to a State of military preparedness and to support every measure designed to compass the defeat of our enemies, and I shall continue to support every measure designed toward that end, knowing full well that in so doing I not only carry out the wishes of my constituency but my own. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 604. That upon all distilled spirits produced in or imported into the United States upon which the tax now imposed by law has been paid, and which, on the day after the passage of this act, are held by any person and intended for sale or for use in the manufacture or production of any article intended for sale, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a floor tax of $2.20 (or, if intended for sale for beverage purposes or for use in the manufacture or production of any article used or intended for use as a beverage, a floor tax of $4.80) on each proof gallon, and a proportionate tax at a like rate on all fractional parts of such proof gallon.

Mr. WALDOW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking a question of the gentleman from North Carolina. I have some constituents back home who are very much interested in this provision. Some of them have purchased three or four barrels of alcohol and have used part of it during the past year. Is this tax going to apply on the remainder?

Mr. KITCHIN. Just the remainder?

Mr. WALDOW. That is all?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is all.

Mr. WALDOW. In other words, on the floor stock?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; just the difference between the taxes which have been paid and this tax.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 621. That the commissioner, by regulations to be approved by the Secretary, may require the use at each fruit distillery of such spirit meters, and such locks and seals to be affixed to fermenters, tanks, or other vessels and to such pipe connections as may in his judgment be necessary or expedient, and is hereby authorized to assign to any such distillery and to each winery where wines are to be fortified such number of gaugers or storekeeper-gaugers in the capacity of gaugers as may be necessary for the proper supervision of the manufacture of brandy or the making or fortifying of wines subject to tax imposed by this section; and the compensation of such officers shall not exceed $5 per diem while so assigned, together with their actual and necessary traveling expenses, and also a reasonable allowance for their board bills, to be fixed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, but not to exceed $2.50 per diem for such board bills.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman from North Carolina if the section just read, section 621, is existing law.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; that is existing law.

Mr. WALSH. And are these men allowed a per diem of $5 per day and also their traveling expenses and then $2.50 a day for their board under existing law?

Mr. KITCHIN. They can receive for their services a compensation not to exceed $5 a day, and in addition they can receive not to exceed $2.50 per diem for their board.

Mr. WALSH. The storekeepers and gaugers employed by the department under this act are paid by the day and not carried upon the monthly roll?

Mr. KITCHIN. They are paid by the day; yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee what is the existing practice as to compensation of gaugers?

Mr. KITCHIN. I can not; I do not know the existing practice. Here is the only thing they have the right to allow—not exceeding $5 a day as compensation, together with traveling expenses, and not exceeding $2.50 for board bills.

Mr. STAFFORD. If my memory serves me right, the gaugers under existing practice receive a flat per diem allowance under which they must pay their own living expenses. If that is the fact you virtually increase their compensation by $2.50 per day, and that is an increase of salary.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman is mistaken. I have the act of September 8, 1916, and the provisions in the bill are existing law.

Mr. STAFFORD. I know that as to some of these deputy collectors the policy of the Bureau of Internal Revenue is to fix a flat per diem allowance, which is the compensation from which they must pay their own expenses.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know the practice, but this provision is existing law.

Mr. WALSH. Can the gentleman state whether or not the gaugers assigned to this particular work are treated on a different basis from those employed in other branches of work?

Mr. KITCHIN. I can not tell the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. It seems from this section that they are making a special provision for these men assigned to distilleries where the wines are to be fortified, giving them special compensation.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am sure they have no more compensation than gaugers in other distilleries.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FOSTER). The Clerk calls the Chair's attention to a typographical error, line 9, page 110, where a letter "s" is missing from the word "less." Without objection, it will be corrected.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

If manufactured or imported to retail at more than 8 cents each and not more than 15 cents each, $12 per thousand.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. On page 117, line 6, we find, "If manufactured or imported to retail at more than 8 cents each and not more than 15 cents each, $12 per thousand." Why did not the committee make it $15 a thousand, the same as they did the 8-cent cigar $8 a thousand? Before the gentleman answers I want to state that I ask this because under the present system we all know the tax is less than 1 cent, and yet the price of a cigar has gone up from 1 to 3 cents because of the war tax. One gentleman stated that he was opposed to this because he felt that he was robbing the people; the price of cigars has gone up, and he had to pass it on, and if the tax was three-eighths of 1 per cent he was making five-eighths on each cigar, and that was supposed to be for war purposes, whereas it went into the pockets of the dealers. If some plan could be worked out so the tax could go into the war fund and not to the profit of the dealers, it would give better satisfaction. I was wondering why the committee did not follow the same system with reference to the 15-cent cigar that it did with the 8-cent cigar.

Mr. KITCHIN. We double the present tax upon all cigars selling for more than 8 cents each. The gentleman will notice that this bracket catches the 10-cent cigar, which will sell for 11 or 12 cents. So in the practical operation it will have the effect that the gentleman suggests.

Mr. SEARS. Suppose they do as they have in the past and for a 10-cent cigar charge 15 cents and make $3 a thousand or more than that?

Mr. KITCHIN. No, they will not; this is to take care of the 10-cent cigar that is going to sell for 12 cents. Besides, we have a provision here that will make it a crime for them to represent that the reason for charging a higher price is on account of the tax; they must correctly represent the increase due to the tax. The committee looked into all the conditions that exist, and it is the intention to double the present tax except on stogies and cigars selling for 8 cents and less.

Mr. STAFFORD. The stogies and cigars that Members of Congress can afford to smoke.

Mr. SEARS. During the consideration of the last bill it was stated that if we would give them time which they desired, especially on cigarettes, to reduce the size of the package and make it 8 instead of 10, the price would not have to be increased. As a matter of fact, the size of the container was reduced; the cigarettes were taken out so that eight remained—and perhaps it would be better if they were all taken out—but instead of selling for 5 cents, they charged 6. They reduced the size of the package one-fifth and raised the price of the package a little over one-fifth so that they got the consumer going and coming. I make this suggestion, hoping that we might stop such practice in the future.

Mr. KITCHIN. This will stop it as much as a tax can stop it. This will catch the 10-cent cigar with the 1 cent or 2 cents extra tax added. It will double the tax.

Mr. SEARS. The point is simply this: If you make this tax even cents instead of a fraction of a cent, then if the seller raises it over that you have him, but with a fraction of a cent, he can raise it a cent, and nobody can complain about it.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman would put it at either $10 or $20?

Mr. SEARS. Either 10 or 15.

Mr. KITCHIN. Fifteen would be a fraction of a cent—a cent and a half.

Mr. SEARS. If the cigars sell for 15 cents each, make it $15 per thousand.

Mr. KITCHIN. The 15-cent cigar will go into the 16 or 17 cent class, and that will catch it in the next bracket of $16. I do not think there is enough in the gentleman's suggestion to justify changing this provision, and I do not think that the taxes on cigars ought to be increased.

Mr. SEARS. I am not complaining about the size of the tax. I am complaining because the people pay more than they should.

Mr. KITCHIN. We can not control the retailer. He may add 3 cents to the selling price of a cigar, or in case of a 5-cent cigar he may add 1 cent and sell it for 6 cents, or 2 cents and sell it for 7 cents, or 3 cents and sell it for 8 cents.

Mr. SEARS. As I understand it, if he sells it for more than 5 cents he pays $8 a thousand.

Mr. KITCHIN. And if he sells it for 8 he pays 8.

Mr. SEARS. On the 15-cent proposition he only pays $12 a thousand.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then you would want the other bracket to be made 20? That bracket says—

If manufactured or imported to retail at more than 15 cents each, and not more than 20 cents each, $16 per thousand.

Mr. SEARS. Let the entire tax go into it.

Mr. KITCHIN. The entire tax would not go into it.

Mr. SEARS. If I am charged three-eighths of a cent, and then I charge you 1 cent, I profit to the amount of the difference between three-eighths of a cent and 1 cent.

Mr. KITCHIN. The retailer is bound to charge what it costs plus the tax, because the tax is added into his purchases. Both the manufacturer and the retailer have to have some profit on their investment besides the tax. The only objection I have heard to this schedule is the size of the tax.

Mr. SEARS. The only objection I have heard is because they charge more than they have really paid as a tax.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is up to the retailer.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 703. That there shall be levied, collected, and paid, in lieu of the taxes imposed by section 404 of the revenue act of 1917, upon cigarette paper made up into packages, books, sets, or tubes, made up in or imported into the United States and sold to any person (other than to a manufacturer of cigarettes for use by him in the manufacture of cigarettes) the following taxes, to be paid by the manufacturer or importer: On each package, book, or set, containing more than 25 but not more than 50 papers, 1 cent; containing more than 50 but not more than 100 papers, 2 cents; containing more than 100 papers, 2 cents for each 100 papers or fractional part thereof; and upon tubes, 4 cents for each 100 tubes or fractional part thereof.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the paragraph just read may be passed over, to be returned to later.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to pass over this paragraph, to be returned to later at the pleasure of the committee. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

(b) No tax shall be levied under this title in respect to any admissions all the proceeds of which inure exclusively to the benefit of religious, educational, or charitable institutions, societies, or organizations, or admissions to agricultural fairs none of the profits of which are distributed to stockholders or members of the association conducting the same.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, we have now reached the section with reference to admissions, and I have an amendment to offer, and I think the gentleman desires to pass over the paragraph.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to pass over this, with the privilege of returning to it. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts has an amendment which he desires to offer, and I desire to look it over.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to pass over the paragraph read, with the privilege of returning to it. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

(5) Positive moving-picture films containing a picture ready for projection, 10 per cent.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman what is the definition of a "positive moving-picture film"?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is a film that our moving-picture theaters use.

Mr. WALSH. That is the one used to project the picture upon the screen?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Why not tax the film where it is manufactured before the picture is taken?

Mr. KITCHIN. All that comes in that section. All of the tax put on prior to that would be merged right into that one.

The Clerk read as follows:

(6) Tennis rackets, golf clubs, baseball bats, lacrosse sticks, balls of all kinds, including baseballs, footballs, tennis, golf, lacrosse, billiard, and pool balls, fishing rods and reels, billiard and pool tables, chess and checker boards and pieces, dice, games and parts of games, except playing cards and children's toys and games, 10 per cent.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question with reference to this excise tax. I see that it is to be levied upon the manufacturer, producer, or importer. What about large dealers such as department stores, people who handle these goods at various times? Suppose a sewing machine is sold and taken back, or a set of furniture is sold and taken back, there is no tax assessed on that. It has to be upon the manufacturer, and after it is paid by the manufacturer there will be no tax upon it. Is that the purpose?

Mr. KITCHIN. The manufacturer or the importer or the producer would pay the tax in the first instance, and, of course, he would charge it up to the wholesaler and the wholesaler would charge it to the retailer.

Mr. ROBBINS. What I want to get clear in my mind is this: Take, for instance, a piano or a sewing machine, which may be sold by a department store on a lease.

Mr. KITCHIN. There will be no tax upon that. The manufacturer would pay it before the wholesaler got it.

Mr. ROBBINS. It has to be paid in the first instance, and then it is free from tax after it is out of his hands.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Ever afterwards.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; exactly like the tobacco tax.

The Clerk read as follows:

(15) Tapestries and textiles for furniture coverings or hangings in the interior decoration of buildings, 10 per cent.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the gentleman from North Carolina a question. I call his attention to section 900 and to an item in section 908, with reference to toilet soaps. Toilet soaps are a great necessity, and in section 908 they are put in the same class with perfumes, essences, extracts, cosmetics, and so forth.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say to the gentleman that when we reach that I shall ask to have it passed over. I think we can get together upon that soap proposition.

Mr. DYER. The reason I call attention to it at this time is that I was going to offer an amendment, which I think the chairman understands.

Mr. KITCHIN. When we reach section 908 I shall ask to have it passed over. Personally I think the gentleman is about right, and that soaps ought to be taken out of the class in which we have put them and put in the 10 per cent manufacturer's class.

Mr. DYER. So that the manufacturers themselves could pay the tax.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would rather bring that up first before the committee.

Mr. DYER. Then I ask unanimous consent that paragraph 900, to that extent, may be passed over, with the privilege of returning to it for the purpose of offering an amendment. I think that is agreeable to the gentleman.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is perfectly agreeable.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent——

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman can not reserve the right to return for a particular purpose.

Mr. KITCHIN. Just pass it over and return to it.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to pass this over.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to pass this paragraph over, with the right, at the pleasure of the committee, to return to the same for the purpose of consideration and amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

(11) Firearms, shells, and cartridges, except those sold for the use of the United States, any State, Territory, or possession of the United States, any political subdivision thereof, the District of Columbia, or any foreign country while engaged in the present war with the Imperial German Government, 25 per cent in the case of pistols and revolvers and 10 per cent in the case of all other firearms and shells and cartridges.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this paragraph just read be passed over because I would like to offer an amendment and I have the facts over on my desk in my office.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is agreeable; I understand that the gentleman has a bona fide amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the paragraph just read to be returned to later for the purpose of amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman mean the paragraph relating to dirk knives, and so forth?

Mr. KITCHIN. To revolvers, paragraph 11.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that paragraph 11 be passed over to be returned to for the purpose of offering ana mendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

(15) Tapestries and textiles for furniture coverings or hangings in the interior decoration of buildings, 10 per cent.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 128, line 24, after the word "centum" insert the words "and cotton used therein, $3 per bale."

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the point of order, I ask unanimous consent, if it is agreeable to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that we read this title through, and then come back to the proposition.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wish to say to the gentleman that a number of gentlemen from the cotton States have spoken to me about this amendment and others which I propose to introduce, and the impression has gone forth that this matter would come up to-morrow. Some gentlemen, I think, have gone out of the Chamber to attend to other business. I have no objection to permitting this to go over with other amendments I shall offer in reference to cotton.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to this title for the purpose of permitting the gentleman to offer an amendment relative to cotton.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Until to-morrow?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; if the gentleman so desires.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer imposing a tax——

Mr. CRISP. The point of order goes over also?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; under this new arrangement, and I will say to the gentleman from Georgia I am perfectly willing to accede to it. I do not want to take advantage of gentlemen who may not be here. In the interest of fair play I suggest——

Mr. CRISP. I am very sure of it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That the motion made by the gentleman from North Carolina be agreed to so that all can have notice.

Mr. KITCHIN. Withdraw your amendment now and offer it so the point of order will be offered——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman refers to the cotton amendment?

Mr. KITCHIN. Withdraw that and then offer it when we return to this title.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I understand the gentleman's proposition will permit me to offer an amendment to-morrow for a new subdivision?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; let the proposition be included in the unanimous consent.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Do I understand that the gentleman wants to pass the whole title at this time?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; let us read the balance of the title.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. When we reach liveries, hunting garments, bathing suits, and so forth, I shall want to offer amendments, if the first amendment passes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly; under the agreement that would be permitted.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am ready to have that discussed at the convenience of those who desire to discuss it.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will these sections passed over be taken up in their regular order when we do return to them? I think the chairman's suggestion was rather different from the unanimous-consent requests that had been previously proffered in reference to other paragraphs. Is it the chairman's idea to return in sequence as they have been passed over?

Mr. KITCHIN. That, of course, would be the regular order; but these matters the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Iowa have raised are very important matters, and suppose we take them up the very first thing to-morrow morning.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is satisfactory, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. When we reach page 138 I desire to offer a cotton amendment providing for a flat tax per bale. I suppose some discussion will be had as to that. Shall we take up the whole thing to-morrow morning?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Might we agree on some time for debate?

Mr. KITCHIN. We will agree on that to-morrow. We can almost finish this bill this afternoon, except two or three disputed points.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to hasten the passage of the bill——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Take up the whole thing to-morrow morning.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask, in the consideration of the amendments to be suggested by the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, with the point of order pending, whether the merits of the amendments will be discussed or discussion be had on the point of order?

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, as far as I am concerned, I would like to have the point of order decided first, because there is no use in discussing the merits of the proposition if the point of order is sustained. I have no objection whatever to the agreement for it to go over until to-morrow.

Mr. MADDEN. The only point I was making was whether discussion could not be had upon the merits of the proposition and let the point of order be decided after the discussion.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me we would be wasting time if the point of order is sustained.

Mr. GARNER. If anybody wants to make a political speech, of course he can extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH. No; he can not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is an economical question; there is no politics in it.

Mr. CRISP. If it is agreeable to the committee, let the question go over and be determined to-morrow when we take up the proposition.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will some gentleman participating in this arrangement so make a motion?

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] have the privilege of returning to this title or other sections of the bill for the purpose of offering their amendments. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is in reference to cotton tax and the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is for putting a tax——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. On the products of child labor.

Mr. KITCHIN. On the products of child labor.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a few amendments to that section myself.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let me make this announcement for the information of all gentlemen. The amendment that is to be offered first is to line 24, page 128, tapestries and textiles, and when we reach page 138 I shall offer an amendment making a flat cotton tax of $3 per bale.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman from North Carolina will ask unanimous consent to have my amendment read at this time——

Mr. KITCHIN. Go ahead and put your amendment in the RECORD.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is a flat cotton tax of $3 per bale.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman can put the amendment in the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, do I understand if anybody else has an amendment to this title he must offer it now?

Mr. GARNER. Certainly; he must offer it now.

Mr. KITCHIN. Those are the only amendments that I have heard of being proposed to this title.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think each reservation, in regard to some particular title, should be made. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN], the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] have the privilege, and they only.

Mr. WALSH. To pass the title and restrict the privilege of offering an amendment to two people is no way to do it.

Mr. KITCHIN. I suggest that when we get to the proper sections, and we read the sections, we can take it up with the other gentlemen. These questions are the two contested questions, and I think they can stand alone. So I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] desires to tax cotton, a farm product. Since he invokes the taxing power against the products of the soil in one section of the country, some gentleman may desire to tax other products of the soil, some produced in the gentleman's own district. The value of the steel products of the gentleman's State alone are within $200,000,000 of the entire cotton crop of the South; and while I do not believe in a direct tax on any of these products, it is a fact that Congress, by laying a tax of $2 per ton on the steel products of Pennsylvania, could raise thirty-odd million dollars in revenue. The gentleman is inviting just such a tax.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We do not attempt any gag law on this side of the House.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] have the privilege of returning to this title at the proper place, or to other sections of the bill, to offer their respective amendments to-morrow morning.

Mr. SABATH. Reserving the right to object, I want to know whether I shall have an opportunity to offer an amendment pertaining to taxing steel products?

Mr. KITCHIN. When you get to that section you can make the request and pass it over for that. But this stands alone.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] asks unanimous consent that the committee to-morrow morning, when the reading of the bill is resumed, return to this title for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] to offer amendments to such appropriate sections of the title as they may determine.

Mr. TILSON. May I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that my colleague from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN] also asked that privilege?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He got it.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] relate to the same title?

Mr. SABATH. To the same section.

Mr. KITCHIN. And I assume that the gentleman from Illinois wants, when we get to page 129, it being the same section, to offer his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. This title 9, to which your unanimous consent relates——

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] asks to offer his amendment later on.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] offered an amendment covering the question that he raises?

The CHAIRMAN. He indicated that he has an amendment.

Mr. WINGO. Has the point of order been determined on that?

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand, to be candid with the House, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Iowa are making this request not only in behalf of those who favor their amendments but in behalf of those who oppose them.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, yes; to give them an opportunity.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would like to see it go. I do not think we have a sufficient number in the House to consider those questions now, but I think we will have more people here to-morrow morning.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to agreeing to a time when a question of that kind can be fully considered; but I think it will be better in keeping with orderly procedure to let the amendments be offered and the point of order determined on them. I do not want anything that will hammer the cotton market down any further.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have offered an amendment to page 128, line 24, that provides that $3 a bale shall be levied upon cotton that enters into the manufacture of tapestries and textiles. When we reach page 138, I shall offer as a new section the following:

SEC. 911. That there should be levied, assessed, collected, and paid upon every bale of cotton, when sold for consumption or use, a tax of $3 a bale.

The first amendment I shall offer when we reach hunting garments, riding habits, bathing suits, and such things in which cotton enters. I make this announcement because a number of gentlemen from the cotton States have suggested that they would like to be here when these amendments come up. I do not want, in view of the rapid reading of the bill to-day, and some of them being absent on departmental business, to take them by surprise. The idea is to give them full notice that to-morrow morning these questions will be raised, so that they will be here to test them.

Mr. DYER. A point of order will be considered?

Mr. HEFLIN. Do I understand that amendments can be offered touching other products?

Mr. WINGO. If a man from any of the cotton States does not know that these amendments are coming up, he is asleep. Cotton has already gone down $4 per bale. I do not want anything hanging fire that the speculators can use between now and tomorrow morning, and if the question is raised I want to have it settled promptly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is up to the President of the United States, if the gentleman pleases.

Mr. WINGO. And I want the point of order settled.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, what is the request?

The CHAIRMAN. The request is for unanimous consent that to-morrow morning, when the committee resumes its session, we shall return to Title IX of the bill in order to allow the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] to offer amendments to the paragraphs under that title.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DYER. This will give Members the right also to make points of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments will be subject to points of order.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not object to returning to section 900, but I shall object to returning to Title IX until the reading has been completed. If the gentleman will make his request to return to section 900 I will offer no objection. But the gentleman's request, as put by the chairman, involves the whole of Title IX, which we have not yet completed. These amendments are to be offered to section 900. I shall not object, as I say, to returning to section 900 for the purpose, but I shall object to leaving Title IX entirely open.

The CHAIRMAN. The unanimous-consent request is not to leave Title IX entirely open. It is to be returned to simply to allow the two designated gentlemen to offer amendments. It does not include other amendments or other gentlemen.

Mr. WALSH. But can gentlemen offer other amendments to this title? There is a request that it be passed over until to-morrow morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts misapprehends the request that the section be passed over. It is only to be passed over until to-morrow morning when we resume the session. Then we return to it.

Mr. KITCHIN. We can go ahead right along.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request?

Mr. KITCHIN. If any other gentleman wants to offer an amendment later he can offer to amend the section or pass that over.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed to the reading of the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

(22) Liveries and livery boots and hats, 10 per cent.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This is one of the points: If the amendment I have already offered, and which will be in the RECORD in the morning, is adopted, I shall, when we reach "Liveries," which is item 22 here, offer the same amendment. I will do the same thing when we reach "Hunting garments, bathing suits," and so forth.

This is an announcement to gentlemen on the other side to be prepared to resist, if they care to, because if the amendment carries it would be logical to follow it up in the case of other items.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. I want to know if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be responsible for the further abbreviation of bathing suits? [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman's inquiry has no reference to the raising of revenue. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(26) Yachts and motor boats; and pleasure boats and canoes if sold for more than $15, 10 per cent.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to-morrow as a separate paragraph after paragraph 26.

Mr. DYER. Reserving the right to object, what is it about?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the disposition of the amendments offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], he shall have the right to offer an amendment to the designated paragraph in this title. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire what it is?

Mr. WALSH. I shall object until we know what the amendment is going to be.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. FOSTER. Let the gentleman from Illinois offer his amendment.

Mr. SABATH. I can not offer it now. I have not got it prepared.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state what the nature of his amendment is going to be?

Mr. SABATH. My amendment is to put a certain tax on steel and steel products.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman be prepared to put it in the RECORD to-day, so that we can read it to-morrow?

Mr. SABATH. I shall endeavor to do so. I did not know we would reach so far to-day, and therefore I did not perfect the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 903. That there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid upon sculpture, paintings, and statuary, sold by any person other than the artist, a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the price for which so sold.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. Here we have an item where we are seeking to tax what is regarded by everybody as luxuries, and yet the tax is only 10 per cent, namely, the tax on sculpture, paintings, and statuary. I noticed, in going through the schedule of special taxes, the tax on automobiles and the like. The rates are rather low, if they are intended to raise any considerable amount of money—5 and 10 per cent. Here we are imposing the rate of only 10 per cent on such luxuries as fine arts.

Mr. KITCHIN. This is the first tax of the kind that has been suggested in a bill or act. The committee thought that if we put a tax of 10 per cent on other luxuries, or similar luxuries, we ought not to put a larger tax than 10 per cent on fine arts. If a piece of fine art sells for $100, we would get $10 as tax.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the moving cause with the committee to make the tax so low on these luxuries? I thought the committee was driven to the wall to find ways of raising revenue; yet when I look at these luxuries I find only 5 and 10 per cent imposed—on automobiles, for instance.

Mr. KITCHIN. That 5 per cent rate is on trucks.

Mr. STAFFORD. Automobile trucks, automobile wagons, and tractors. Those are necessities, of course.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Almost exactly the same relative increases were made in the incomes from corporations.

Mr. STAFFORD. There may have been the same relative increases, but the question in my mind is why the committee went so low and did not go higher in their rates when they were driven to the wall to find subjects of taxation.

Mr. KITCHIN. With 10 per cent we get the required revenue, and the gentleman will see that with a tax of 20 or 30 per cent on articles of fine art the amount raised would be only a drop in the bucket from a revenue standpoint. If you put the whole list at 30 per cent I doubt if some so-called luxuries would produce any tax at all, because the tax would be so high that there would be no sale for the article.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I notice that on those luxuries called dirk knives, bowie knives, daggers, and brass knuckles the print of the bill puts the tax at 100 per cent. Is that an extra cipher, or is that the tax intended to be levied?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; the tax is intended to be 100 per cent on luxuries of that kind.

Mr. STAFFORD. Those secretive luxuries?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; and on pistols 25 per cent.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 905. (a) That on and after November 1, 1918, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a tax equivalent to 20 per cent of so much of the amount paid for any of the following articles as is in excess of the price hereinafter specified as to each such article, when such article is sold for consumption or use——

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, in line 13, on page 131, I move to strike out "20" and insert "10."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PLATT: Page 131, line 13, strike out "20" and insert in lieu thereof "10."

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that, if this amendment should by any possibility happen to carry, I should offer further amendments to reduce the limit of the price on each of the items (1), (2), (3), (4), and so on, to one-half the amounts now carried in the bill. I think it is absurd to have a tax of 20 per cent on the excess price of trunks costing more than $50. We might just as well have a tax of 10 per cent on trunks costing more than $25—on the excess paid above $25—and get some revenue. In the same way the limits on the other articles are excessively high, so that the revenue collected will amount to very little. It is perfectly evident that this whole section is not intended to collect revenue to any considerable extent. There is a tax of 20 per cent on the excess cost of hats of over $5. I should like to have the glorious privilege of being able to pay a little tax on hats, and yet, as I said the other day, I do not think I ever paid over $5 for a hat in my life, except once or twice, and any man who feels that he must avoid paying any tax can in every town buy a very good-looking and very serviceable hat for half that amount. Why not put the bracket down to $2.50, so I can have the privilege of paying a little tax when I buy a hat once or twice a year?

Mr. DYER. I judge it was the intention of the committee that there should be no tax on articles of necessity, like clothes and hats, except where people buy expensive articles. There are some people with whom the price cuts no figure, and they can afford to pay the tax.

Mr. PLATT. It is perfectly evident that the main purpose is not raising revenue. So far as suits of clothes are concerned, the purpose appears to be to drive all the custom tailors out of business.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman does not understand that a hat costing less than $5 will be taxed?

Mr. PLATT. I do not; and I have rarely paid as much as $5 for a hat. I should like to have the privilege of paying a few cents tax once in a while. Why not put the limit down to $2.50? That will buy a good enough hat for anybody.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That will not help the revenue any. The gentleman may buy a hat up to $4.99 without paying any tax. The tax does not go on until the limit of $5 is reached, and then it goes onto the amount that is in excess of $5.

Mr. PLATT. Certainly. I understand all that, and that will not raise any revenue. When the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] was arguing against taxing State bonds and municipal bonds the argument was raised in opposition to what he said that we must raise revenue for the boys in the trenches. Now, here is a tax that is not intended to raise revenue. Put the tax down lower and reduce the brackets, and then everybody will contribute a few cents.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from New York has reiterated the statement that we will get no revenue from this. The Treasury Department estimates that we will get $185,000,000 from this section. I consider that is some money when we have got to pay the expenses of the Government. The only trouble is that the gentleman's premises are wrong.

Mr. PLATT. That is based purely on the theory that the people will go on paying the higher prices when the tax is put on, and many of them certainly will not.

Mr. GARNER. I am more willing to take the estimate of the Treasury Department than I am the estimate of the gentleman from New York. These gentlemen who have made these estimates have not been very much out of line in all the estimates they have made, and they say this will raise $185,000,000.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman state what the Treasury Department said could be raised by making the tax 10 per cent and reducing the bracket limits one-half?

Mr. GARNER. We never asked them for that. The gentleman has stated repeatedly that this is not for revenue purposes. It is for revenue purposes.

Mr. PLATT. You will find that the Treasury Department will tell you that you can raise three times as much revenue by fixing the limit and the per cent of the tax as I have stated.

Mr. GARNER. This levies a tax on the amount in excess of a certain price. Now, if you are going to reduce the limit of price and levy a tax of 10 per cent on the excess, I do not see how you are going to collect any more revenue.

Mr. PLATT. How many people pay more than $5 for a hat and how many people pay more than $2.50 for a hat? The gentleman must know that not more than one man in a thousand ever pays more than $5 for a hat, where a thousand men will pay as much as $3, which, at the rate of 10 per cent, as I have proposed, on the excess over $2.50 would collect 5 cents from each of them. On a $3.50 hat the purchaser would pay a dime of tax, and on a $4 hat 15 cents. Nobody would object, but a lot of revenue would be raised.

Mr. TREADWAY. Are not these articles enumerated in section 905 practically every one of them common necessities used by the people? The idea of this section was not to tax these articles in general use at a moderate cost. If anyone sees fit to pay an exorbitant price for a suit of clothes or a hat, let him pay the tax. I am afraid the gentleman from New York has not tried to buy a new fall hat if he thinks $5 is a limit of price. Let him go down on Pennsylvania Avenue and he will find to the contrary. Nevertheless it is a fact that we do not intend to tax the people on the ordinary use of articles purchased at moderate prices. The purpose is to reach the excess or high prices, and it is absolutely right in the taxation of luxuries, and the gentleman is wrong, as he frequently is.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more. I want to say something in my own time. The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, who has just spoken, has argued directly opposite to that of his colleague from Texas [Mr. GARNER], who said a few minutes ago that this was to raise revenue. The gentleman from Massachusetts says the purpose of this is only to get a little revenue out of the people who pay extravagant prices.

Mr. TREADWAY. If the gentleman will yield, Did I use the word "only" or little revenue in any stage of my remarks? If so, I will erase the words, because I agree with my distinguished colleague from Texas that this will raise $185,000,000 of money, and one hundred and eighty-five millions is a lot of money.

Mr. PLATT. I am glad that the gentleman agrees with his colleague once in a while.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

(17) Men's, women's, misses', and boys' boots, shoes, pumps, and slippers, on the amount in excess of $10 per pair.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to section 17.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 133, line 2, after the word "slippers" insert "not including shoes or appliances made for wounded, crippled, deformed feet or ankles."

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman that the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from North Carolina, has arranged to lay that matter before the committee to-morrow. Will the gentleman consent to its going over?

Mr. MERRITT. I will.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this amendment go over until to-morrow, with the privilege of returning to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that this amendment be passed over until to-morrow, with the privilege of returning to the section. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the gentleman from Texas if the committee has considered, with reference to paragraph 17, the excluding of boots and shoes for officers in the military and naval forces of the United States?

Mr. GARNER. I have heard no suggestion of that kind.

Mr. DYER. I would like to offer an amendment to that effect.

Mr. GARNER. I will call it to the attention of the committee to-morrow morning when we meet.

Mr. DYER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent that we may return to section 17 for the purpose of offering an amendment excluding boots and shoes for officers in the military and naval forces of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to return to-morrow, at the pleasure of the committee, to section 17 for the purpose of considering an amendment which he proposes to offer. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 907. That on and after November 1, 1918, in addition to the tax imposed by section 906, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid, a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the amount paid for any article commonly or commercially known as jewelry, composed in whole or in part of platinum, when sold for consumption or use.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

USE OF PLATINUM IN MAKING MUNITIONS OF WAR.

Mr. TILSON. In the course of a very interesting and instructive speech of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] a few days ago while explaining the paragraph of the bill covering platinum, he referred to the use of platinum as a war metal. In response to a question from me he explained very briefly the uses of platinum in the war and asked me to corroborate what he said, which I now gladly do. In doing so I wish to go a little further than he did, for I have found by experience that the membership of this House are eager for information, even to details, in matters vitally connected with the war.

Platinum is a highly essential war metal. It can not be fully replaced by any other known substance.

In the ordinary buzzer, commonly used by the Signal Corps, about a half a dram of platinum—troy weight—is used in each instrument, while the buzzer telephone requires almost as much of the same material, it being in the form of wire.

Practically all telephone and telegraph instruments where low voltage, make-and-break circuits are used, require a special contact metal, and this usually contains about 7 per cent of platinum.

In connection with radio work, the tubes used in both the audion receivers and the transmitting sets require a small amount of platinum.

It is estimated that the Signal Corps alone will use within the next year approximately 500 ounces of platinum.

By far the greatest use of platinum, however, is in the manufacture of explosives, although it does not form a component part of the explosive substance.

In the production of T. N. T., trinitrotoluol; guncotton, nitrocellulose; dynamite, nitroglycerin; and in picric acid a considerable amount of nitric acid is used. In making nitric acid from the Chile nitrates sulphuric acid is used.

Sulphuric acid is made in two different ways: First, contact process; second, chamber process.

The chamber process requires large amounts of sheet lead, which in our present situation is out of the question. Besides, the acid produced by this process is too weak for the purposes for which it is needed, therefore we may eliminate this process.

The contact process requires the use of platinum. A plant producing 20 tons of sulphuric acid in a day will require from 350 to 400 ounces of platinum.

Platinum is also necessary in producing nitric acid directly from the air by the synthetic process. It is estimated that the need for platinum for our synthetic nitrate plants when they shall have been completed will be approximately 20,000 ounces.

It will thus be seen that platinum is a very important metal in the carrying on of the war. Some anxiety has been felt in connection with it. The paragraph in the bill, as explained so well by the gentleman from Ohio, if it produces very little revenue, as will probably be the case, will nevertheless serve the very important purpose of helping to locate the platinum supply of the country.

Much of the available platinum supply is in the hands of dealers and jewelers. Some of it serves as settings for much of the fascinating jewelry worn sometimes by the ladies. Some one said in debate the other day that the principal reason for the fashion of setting jewels in platinum is because platinum is extremely expensive and that if lead were more expensive it would soon be the fashion for the fair sex to have their jewels set in lead. I forget who the gentleman is who said it, but he must be a misanthrope or a bachelor. Like most things, there is a reason for this preference on the part of the ladies for platinum settings, and in this instance, as usual, their judgment is good.

The very qualities that make this metal so essential for certain fine instruments help make it desirable as a setting for jewels. It serves the purpose admirably, the ladies like it, and under normal conditions they are entitled to have it.

These are not normal times, however, as we are so frequently reminded, and no one is entitled to have anything that may be essential for waging war. The dealers and jewelers, as a rule, are just as zealous for the war as any other class of citizens. So far as the portion of the platinum supply in the keeping of the ladies is concerned, we need not be uneasy. It will be available if needed. From the earliest Biblical times it is a matter of record that the women have stripped themselves of their jewels in order to contribute them toward a cause near to their hearts.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SLOAN. Has Connecticut adopted the woman suffrage amendment?

Mr. TILSON. There is such an amendment pending, I will say to my friend, for the consideration of our next State legislature.

In my judgment, if it should become necessary to have more platinum than is now available in order to make munitions for this war, it would require only a call to the patriotic men and women of this land. In case of such a call we should have a repetition of that early scene where "both men and women, as many as were willing hearted, brought bracelets and earrings and rings and tablets," an offering unto the Lord. In case there should prove to be any, especially among dealers, who are not "willing hearted" we have a former distinguished Member of this House acting as Alien Property Custodian, whose services might be utilized in proper cases. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

(1) Perfumes, essences, extracts, toilet waters, cosmetics, petroleum jellies, hair oils, pomades, hair dressings, hair restoratives, hair dyes, tooth and mouth washes, dentifrices, tooth pastes, aromatic cachous, toilet soaps and powders, or any similar substance, article, or preparation by whatsoever name known or distinguished, any of the above which are used or applied or intended to be used or applied for toilet purposes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This paragraph has reference to the same matter to which I called the attention of the committee a few moments ago on page 128 under section 900. If the committee will look at the language beginning in line 24——

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. May I say to the gentleman, to save time, that the committee intends to consider that matter in the morning?

Mr. DYER. I just want to take a minute to call attention to the fact that in this paragraph on page 136, line 2, appear the words "toilet soaps," being classed among the luxuries. Probably some members of the committee do not know the fact, but in fixing revenue upon things contained in this section the Treasury Department includes under the words "toilet soaps" every soap used for any purpose whatsoever, except soaps used exclusively for laundry purposes. Even if a laundry soap is used or advertised in any way, shape, or manner for toilet purposes, it is taxed under these words. So every soap you use in your household for toilet purposes, every soap used in the cleansing of grease, such as railroad men and Navy men use, is taxed under those words "toilet soaps." I just want to call the attention of the committee to that fact, and I ask unanimous consent that the paragraph be passed over under the same arrangement as the other matter, so that the committee may take it up in the morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the paragraph just read may be passed over, to be returned to at the pleasure of the committee, with the right on the part of the gentleman to offer an amendment thereto. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 910. That upon all articles (other than secondhand articles) enumerated in section 900 in respect to which the tax imposed by section 600 or 602 of the revenue act of 1917 was payable, and which on the day after the passage of this act are held and intended for sale by any person, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a floor tax equivalent to the difference between (a) the tax imposed by section 900 of this act upon the sale of such articles and (b) the corresponding tax imposed by section 600 of the revenue act of 1917.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of inquiring whether the committee took into account the enormous tax that this is going to put on dealers who carry a large stock of the goods such as enumerated in section 900. Is it the intention that a dealer who has a stock of goods, including articles enumerated in section 900, falling under the head of a department store, would have to pay this tax right away?

Mr. GARNER. No; the gentleman will note that they are allowed seven months in which to pay the floor tax.

Mr. ROBBINS. It is a tax upon the entire stock on the basis of the inventory at the date of the approval of this statute.

Mr. GARNER. On the basis of a floor tax, and they have seven months in which to pay the tax.

Mr. ROBBINS. Did the committee take into account that this will be a great burden on a store, such as the Horne store in Pittsburgh, and the Kaufman & Baer store, and Kaufman & Bros. store, and stores like these exist in many parts of the country?

Mr. GARNER. The committee took into account the burden that will be on the people who own these goods and also took into account that unless you levied this floor tax you would give people who have bought up stock a tremendous advantage over their competitors who have to buy under the new tax law, and so as to put all on an equality we were compelled to levy a floor tax or else lose the amount from those who had already stocked up their goods or would stock up after this bill, and that would be a tremendous advantage over their competitors.

Mr. ROBBINS. Of course you have investigated this subject, but I have heard a great many complaints about this provision, and I have had some letters from merchants who fear the burden of this tax. Did your committee make any investigation to find out the amount of the tax, say, on a store that carries half a million dollars in stock, what the probable burden is going to be on a store of that sort? We have in the city of Pittsburgh, and we have in Greensburg, my native city, such stores. We have the Troutman store, carrying a couple of hundred thousand dollars in stock. In Pittsburgh we have Kaufman & Baer and Joseph Horne & Co., carrying a million dollars' worth of stock each. What is going to be the burden on these department stores if you are going within seven months to compel them to pay the entire tax? Did your committee take into account this is going to be an enormous burden on those establishments?

Mr. GARNER. Yes; the committee, of course, looked at every phase of it. After taking the jewelry out of this classification and placing it in a separate section and advancing the tax upon it the consensus of the committee was that the business would be able to adjust itself to this particular tax without any very great hardship and that the hardship of those who now own the goods would be more than offset by the fact that if we failed to levy this floor tax there would be a discrimination and there would be a readjustment of business, and which might put some of the competitors out of business.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROBBINS. I promised to yield to the gentleman from New York a moment ago. Then I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman realizes in a store like Horne & Co. they are supposed to turn in their inventory at least more than once per annum, and instantly this law goes into effect the 10 per cent they are paying will be added to the merchandise on hand which they sell thereafter, and within the seven months most of their stock would be turned over at an increase in price.

Mr. ROBBINS. I know that would afford some relief. I find some of them complain very bitterly about this proposed tax.

Mr. SNYDER. I think the gentleman will find that will very nearly afford full relief. I would like to say further I have many large establishments in my district, and I have not heard any complaints on this question.

Mr. PLATT. Will not this amount put a double tax on the consumer? The dealer pays this tax on his stock and now adds that, and then he adds another 10 per cent, and he charges that to the consumer.

Mr. ROBBINS. I do not understand that he pays a lump sum to the Government. He will do that in seven months and add it to the cost of the goods he is selling. I would not say it would be a double tax.

Mr. PLATT. That 10 per cent tax is going to be added by the wholesaler on all goods he buys after that and then another 10 per cent will be added to his price to the consumer.

Mr. ROBBINS. That would not be added to the price of the new goods?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly it will. The price to the consumer is generally determined by the cost of replenishing the stock of goods. I do not see how it can work out except as a double tax on the consumer.

Mr. ROBBINS. I am not defending this tax.

Mr. PLATT. It is not justifiable; it is an imposition on the consumer.

Mr. ROBBINS. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois if he wishes to ask a question; if not, I withdraw the amendment, having obtained the information I sought.

The Clerk read as follows:

(1) Every domestic corporation shall pay annually a special excise tax with respect to carrying on or doing business, equivalent to $1 for each $1,000 of so much of the fair average value of its capital stock for the preceding year ending June 30 as is in excess of $5,000. In estimating the value of capital stock the surplus and undivided profits shall be included.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to inquire of the committee what the existing tax is under section 407 of the revenue act of 1916.

Mr. GARNER. Fifty cents, with a limitation of $99,000. Now, we make it $1, and cut the limitation down to $5,000. That is the only change in the law.

Mr. KREIDER. What do you mean by limit?

Mr. GARNER. Exemption, deduction.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. This is changed from $99,000 to $5,000.

Mr. GARNER. And increased to $1 per thousand.

Mr. KREIDER. Will the gentleman yield? Heretofore this tax has been a tax on the capital stock valuation.

Mr. GARNER. It is changed.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield again? I simply want to ask whether the surplus is to be considered as part of the capital and taxed?

Mr. GARNER. It will.

The Clerk read as follows:

(1) Brokers shall pay $100. Every person whose business it is to negotiate purchases or sales of stocks, bonds, exchange, bullion, coined money, bank notes, promissory notes, other securities, produce or merchandise, for others, shall be regarded as a broker. If a broker is a member of a stock exchange, or if he is a member of any produce exchange, board of trade, or similar organization, where produce or merchandise is sold, he shall pay an additional amount as follows: If the average value, during the preceding year ending June 30, of a seat or membership in such exchange or organization was not more than $2,000, $50; if such value was more than $2,000 and not more than $5,000, $100; if such value was more than $5,000, $150.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOOD of Indiana: Page 139, line 18, after the word "others," insert "except traveling salesmen."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, unless this section is amended as to this language, every traveling salesman in the country will be subject to this payment of $100. The language as it now reads provides:

Every person whose business it is to negotiate purchases or sales of stocks, bonds, exchange, bullion, coined money, bank notes, promissory notes, other securities, produce or merchandise, for others.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Does the gentleman think that a traveling salesman really makes the sale for the owner or corporation for whom he is working, or is he not acting as agent?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. He makes the sale.

Mr. SNYDER. Not as the owner. I do not think he would come in under that section.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. A broker does not necessarily make a sale as an owner. The broker is an intermediary between the seller and purchaser.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Will not the gentleman ask unanimous consent that his amendment be pending, with the privilege of returning to it to-morrow, so that the committee can consider it in the morning? I will say to the gentleman that the committee did not intend to include traveling salesmen, and I do not believe the construction as placed by the Treasury Department would include them, but we will take it up in the morning, so that he can be assured of the facts when the committee meets to-morrow morning.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his amendment be pending, to be taken up hereafter at the pleasure of the committee. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

(12) Every person carrying on the business of operating for hire three or more passenger automobiles (other than sight-seeing automobiles having a seating capacity of more than seven) shall pay a tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the gross receipts during the preceding year ending June 30 from the operation of each such automobile.

Mr. STAFFORD. I move to strike out the last word. I would like to inquire of the gentleman having the bill in charge why we make a distinction in these two prior paragraphs in fixing the date June 30 for the determination of the tax rather than the calendar year?

Mr. GARNER. June 30 is the date for the payment of special taxes by the general statute.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, under this paragraph is it the purpose to tax the owners of these sight-seeing automobiles and taxis on all their receipts prior to June 30, 1918, or June 30, 1919?

Mr. GARNER. June 30, 1918.

Mr. STAFFORD. The language is rather ambiguous. It does not set forth any year. It says during the preceding year ending June 30.

Mr. GARNER. It says the preceding year. The general tax requires all the taxes of the fiscal year to end June 30.

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume it would be June 30, 1919.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman will turn to page 139, he will see:

SEC. 1001. That on and after January 1, 1919, there should be levied, collected, and paid annually, in lieu of the taxes imposed by section 407 of the revenue act of 1916 the following special taxes—

And this is under those special taxes.

Mr. SNYDER. I want to ask the committee, in reference to this clause (12), if when they considered the 5 per cent tax on gross receipts of taxicab companies they considered the fact that, with most taxicab companies the rates they can charge are fixed by municipal ordinance and they have no possible way of raising their rates?

Mr. GARNER. The committee, in considering this particular tax, discussed it for some little time, and probably devoted more time to it than the item was worth, compared with other items, and that is one reason it is 5 per cent instead of 10 per cent. The committee first made it 10 per cent, but after more elaborate consideration of it, and considering some of the arguments such as made by the gentleman now, they decided to put it at 5 per cent. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] can give the gentleman more information about that than any other man in the House.

Mr. SNYDER. I happen to know of one case where this will probably mean that a very large taxicab company will have to go out of the business and the Government will have no tax at all from it.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman understands that in levying these taxes the committee could not take into consideration the various laws of the States and municipalities in reference to the subject matter taxed by this bill.

Mr. SNYDER. I appreciate that quite fully, and I wanted to know if that phase of the matter had been considered?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question there?

Mr. GARNER. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Why did not the committee decide to levy the tax on net receipts, as in other cases, instead of gross receipts? Five per cent on gross receipts may be equivalent to 25 per cent on net receipts. For instance, a man might have large gross receipts and lose money.

Mr. GARNER. As I answered the gentleman a while ago, my recollection is that we went back to this subject two or three times, taking into consideration the suggestions made by the gentleman now. Now, as to the gross receipt feature, we finally decided that possibly 5 per cent was as high as we could go in this particular industry without very great injury.

Mr. MADDEN. There are a great many concerns with large gross receipts that lose money. And if this happens to apply to concerns of that sort, of course this would add to the loss and put them out of business possibly.

Mr. GARNER. Yes; I know.

Mr. MADDEN. It would put them out of business.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr SNYDER. The point I intended to make was that with this 5 per cent on the gross receipts it was impossible for them to do business.

Mr. MADDEN. They may be able to get a municipal ordinance passed to enable them to raise the price.

Mr. SNYDER. There will not be any chance of that in many cases.

Mr. MADDEN. There may not be any chance, but still in great cities where taxicabs are needed the municipal government may see the necessity of giving them the right to charge more. Yet, if they do not get that right, many of them will have to go out of business. Of course, it is a precarious business anyway. The ownership and operation of taxicabs is a very precarious business. There is a great deal of wear and tear. They do not make much money at best. In many cases they do not stay in it longer than to use up the capital invested in it. It seems to me it is a great hardship on a very essential but precarious business. I have had word from two or three people who are engaged in this business at home, saying that they really would not be able to live if this tax were imposed.

Mr. GARNER. As I stated a while ago, after we went over this matter on two or three different occasions we finally decided that probably by leaving it at 5 per cent, instead of 10 per cent, as originally placed in the bill, the business throughout the country would be able to adapt itself to this tax and absorb it, and the different municipalities would be able to grant increased rates, if necessary, so as to absorb this particular tax.

Mr. MADDEN. Perhaps it might. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Most of the taxicabs in the big cities are operated on the basis of the percentage paid to the driver. They do not pay salaries. The cab driver purchases the gasoline, as I understand, and operates the machine, which is furnished to him by the company, and the tires are supplied and all the repair equipment. Would the gross receipts contemplated by this bill mean the amount of money turned in by the cab drivers to the company? Would the amount of money turned in by the cab drivers to the company be considered the gross receipts, or would the amount of money received by the drivers be considered the gross receipts?

Mr. GARNER. I imagine the gross receipts would be the gross receipts by the taxicab company during the 30 days.

Mr. MADDEN. After the driver had been paid?

Mr. GARNER. After the driver had been paid and other expenses paid.

Mr. ROBBINS. That would not be the gross receipts.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think there is a good deal in what the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] says about the taxicabs being regulated as to their rates by municipal ordinance. I think provision should be made for such a case as that. I suggest that we pass this paragraph over for the time being.

Mr. GARNER. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to pass over this section 12, to be taken up later at the pleasure of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that section 12 be passed over, to be taken up at the pleasure of the committee. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(13) Every person carrying on the business of a brewer, distiller, wholesale liquor dealer, retail liquor dealer, wholesale dealer in malt liquor, retail dealer in malt liquor, or manufacturer of stills, as defined in section 3244 as amended and section 3247 of the Revised Statutes, in any State, Territory, or District of the United States contrary to the laws of such State, Territory, or District, or in any place therein in which carrying on such business is prohibited by local or municipal law, shall pay, in addition to all other taxes, special or otherwise, imposed by existing law or by this act, $1,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ascertain from the committee how much revenue is expected to be derived by virtue of this excise tax, this special tax, taxing dealers in liquors, alcoholic or maltous, $1,000. How much has it been estimated will be derived from that?

Mr. GARNER. We have no estimate.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman assume that they will all be engaged in the illicit sale of liquor by reason of the national prohibition law and the proclamation of the President forbidding the manufacture of beer and near beer after December 1? What is the purpose of the committee in imposing this high license tax of $1,000?

Mr. GARNER. We thought this was one of the businesses that could stand this high tax. We therefore imposed it at $1,000. The authorities of Texas and other great States that have prohibition and enforce the law will approve it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then it is the purpose of the National Government to recognize the evasion of the law in the sale of liquors in States which forbid it?

Mr. GARNER. Not any more than it is now. It only changes the tax levied on persons who get permits to sell liquor. It changes the tax from $1,000 to $1,025 in certain portions of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(14) Proprietors of any trade, business, or profession, the gross receipts of which for the preceding year ending June 30 exceed $2,000 shall pay $10. If such gross receipts from sources other than sales directly to the consumer exceed $100,000, the proprietor shall pay $15 additional.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, here is evidently a tax on professions, the learned professions. Is that the committee's intention, to tax the ministry and the legal profession and the dental profession and the medical profession—doctors and authors and everything?

Mr. GARNER. I do not think a minister is a proprietor.

Mr. ROBBINS. It says "professions." That certainly covers the learned professions, as we know them, of the law and the ministry and medicine. Is it the purpose of the committee to impose such a tax?

Mr. GARNER. It is intended to cover the professions of law and medicine. I do not think a minister of the gospel would come under it, however.

Mr. ROBBINS. How are you going to make that kind of a construction? It will cover school-teaching and the professions of ministers and authors and painters. Is that the intention of the committee?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman would not take the words "proprietors of any trade or business" as a profession.

Mr. ROBBINS. It is covered by the term "profession."

Mr. LONGWORTH. He is not a proprietor.

Mr. TILSON. To whom would that apply?

Mr. GARNER. The difference is that the minister gets a salary, while these other people are called in. The minister and the school-teacher receive salaries, and those professions are different from a profession like that of law or medicine, where fees are charged for service.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is it the idea here to restrict this to those who are proprietors of a trade or business? Who would be the proprietor of a profession?

Mr. GARNER. He would have to be under this provision.

Mr. ROBBINS. The proprietor of a profession is not known.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It says the proprietors of any trade, business, or profession. It could not by any possibility be considered to apply to an individual physician or to the individuals of a firm of lawyers. It would apply to one of these dental firms, one of these advertising firms of doctors, or something of that sort, but it will not apply to ministers or to individuals. Why should the word "profession" be in this paragraph?

Mr. GARNER. Because we want lawyers to pay a tax. All those earning over $2,000 in these war times can afford to pay $10.

Mr. ROBBINS. Lawyers?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Does it mean the individual?

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman from Ohio has just stated that it does not apply to individuals.

Mr. WALSH. Who is the proprietor of a firm of lawyers?

Mr. TREADWAY. If the gentleman will yield, it seems to me it is very clear. If two men are engaged in a business, occupation, or profession as an organization, as a copartnership of lawyers; for instance, if Smith & Jones hang out their shingle——

Mr. ROBBINS. Two lawyers or two doctors?

Mr. TREADWAY. Or an individual, as I understand it. If you, as an individual, hang out your sign as a lawyer, that would make you eligible to the payment of this tax. If you were employed by the firm of Smith & Jones, but still were practicing your profession as a lawyer, you would not be subject to this tax. It is to be applied to the people carrying on business for themselves, or who are the responsible parties carrying on a trade, business, or profession. If a lawyer is practicing law alone, and his name appears as such, that is equivalent to a firm agreement. He makes the agreement individually, just the same as two men combined would——

Mr. ROBBINS. You think an individual would not be liable for this tax?

Mr. TREADWAY. A single lawyer practicing as such would be subject to this tax. If I am running my own business, if I am conducting a country store and my name appears as the proprietor of that store, that is my business. If you and I are in partnership together, then it will be the firm that will pay that tax. It looks to me to be a very plain, simple proposition, and an excellent provision.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: After the word "trade," in line 6, page 14, insert the word "or"; and, after the word "business," insert the words "or persons engaged in the practice of a," so that it will read:

Proprietors of any trade or business, or persons engaged in the practice of a profession.

Mr. ROBBINS. That will make it very clear.

Mr. LONDON. I submit to the gentleman that the expression "proprietors of any trade, business, or profession" does not mean anything, so far as the word "profession" is concerned. There is no such thing as the proprietor of a profession. The word "profession" is a higher and better sounding name for the word "trade." It is usually applicable to more intellectual occupations. The amendment which I have offered will make the meaning clear. If a person practicing a profession has gross earning in excess of $2,000, I do not think $10 is an excessive license fee.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I will ask unanimous consent that this amendment go over until to-morrow morning, so that the committee can consider it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Why not let it be settled now?

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] desires to have the matter go over until to-morrow morning, and I make the request at his suggestion.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There is no doubt in the world that if the gentleman's amendment goes through in the form in which he offers it, it will impose a tax upon ministers of the gospel.

Mr. GARNER. The tax suggested under the amendment of the gentleman from New York would undoubtedly tax every clerk and every professional office in the United States, which I am satisfied he does not mean to do.

Mr. LONDON. If the gross receipts exceed $2,000.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that if there is any paragraph that needs to be considered and rewritten, and for that purpose passed over, it is this paragraph. About five members of the Committee on Ways and Means have attempted to explain this, and there have been five different and absolutely contradictory explanations made by the five men.

Mr. GARNER. I ask unanimous consent that the paragraph be passed over until to-morrow for amendment.

Mr. LONDON. And that my amendment be considered as pending.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is the request for unanimous consent pending?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not been formally put yet. The gentleman from Texas is stating it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It has not been stated?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not been formally stated by the Chair.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, is it in order to move to strike out the last word?

The CHAIRMAN. The debate is proceeding informally. The request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] is that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] may go over until to-morrow and be pending then, to be taken up at the pleasure of the committee.

Mr. GARNER. No; I ask that the paragraph go over, which, of course, would carry the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

The CHAIRMAN. The request is that the paragraph go over until to-morrow and that the amendment of the gentleman be considered as pending, to be taken up at the pleasure of the committee. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, in view of the statement made by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] that so many members of the Committee on Ways and Means have differed as to the meaning of this paragraph, I want to say that I have a very distinct recollection as to what was intended to be done by this paragraph. It was found that very many people were not paying income taxes. In fact, a large proportion of the people, many of them in business, were not paying income taxes, and it was intended that this $10 tax should be in the nature of a license to do business. It was intended to be a mercantile tax, as it were. You may call it a head tax or occupation tax, but it was to be $10 for all those doing business up to $2,000. It is a very simple proposition.

Mr. TILSON. Does that mean that if there was a firm of lawyers composed of five or six, making $99,000 joint income, the tax for the entire firm of lawyers would be $10?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. And one lawyer making more than $2,000 would pay $10?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is correct.

Mr. TILSON. Why should you not make it $10 for each lawyer, each professional man?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It was intended to be a mercantile or business tax. As I have explained, there are many people in the United States in trade, in business, in professions, that do not pay a tax, and it was intended that they should be checked up for this license of $10. It was not called a license, because that term might not apply, but that is what it really is. It is a registering-up proposition.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman oppose the proposition that this go over until to-morrow?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not oppose its going over, but the gentleman from Connecticut left the impression that the Members of the Ways and Means Committee did not understand the paragraph.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman, it seems, does not agree with the rest of the Members.

Mr. TREADWAY. I want to say that I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he has explained it correctly and as the rest of us understand it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I object to its going over. We might as well vote on it now.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, has my time expired?

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. LONDON. I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask if it is not the intention of the committee to tax every person engaged in the practice of a profession, such as dentists, physicians, lawyers, architects, and other members of the liberal professions? Was not that the intention of the committee?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. With respect to certain occupations the gentleman has mentioned, yes. If several lawyers grouped together and advertised, which is unprofessional, it was intended to reach them; if a number of dentists put out signs and advertised, it was intended that they should be caught.

Mr. LONDON. If that be the case the committee used no language that can in any way approach it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Of course, it is intended to include legitimate business, but the gentleman from New York referred to some professions that are not caught by the income tax, and it was intended that they should be registered for a $10 tax.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with the amendment of the gentleman from New York, and I think there is a disagreement between the members of the committee in regard to the meaning of the provision in the bill. But as the gentleman's amendment would include school-teachers and ministers, would it be his intention to cover them in this tax?

Mr. LONDON. I would perhaps make an exception in favor of ministers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Ministers making over $2,000 a year?

Mr. LONDON. I would make an exception in favor of ministers on the ground that they deal with matters not connected with this world. I do not know about teachers; I think a teacher who is receiving $2,000 or over regular pay can afford to pay a tax of $10. I assume that even lawyers are useful men, and when you are willing to tax lawyers why should not you tax teachers and physicians as useful men.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. When the matter was before the committee the intention was, or my intention was, that every individual lawyer and every individual doctor should pay $10.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by adding after the word "professions," "except ministers."

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I am not satisfied with the language suggested by the gentleman from New York, and I think myself the committee had better consider this question again. I want to renew the request that the paragraph with the gentleman's amendment pending be passed over until to-morrow morning, to be taken up hereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the paragraph with the amendment of the gentleman from New York go over to be taken up hereafter at the pleasure of the committee. Is there objection?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I am not going to oppose the request of the gentleman from Illinois for the paragraph to go over until to-morrow morning, but as I may not be able to be present at the moment of discussion I want to make one or two suggestions to the committee. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that the language used here is broad enough to cover any proprietor of any trade, any proprietor of any business, and anyone who practices a profession. The practitioner of a profession is a proprietor of that profession. The language is unhappy and does not clearly express that but it does seem to cover it. I suggest to the committee that it would appear to cover corporations. On page 138, section 1000 (a) it provides that on and after July 1, 1918, in lieu of the tax imposed by the first subdivision, and so forth, every domestic corporation shall pay annually a special excise tax of $1 for each thousand. Under the language of this bill you propose an additional tax, because the corporation would be a proprietor in trade and business.

Then, again, when you examine the concluding sentence of the paragraph you will find—

If such gross receipts from sources other than sales directly to the consumer exceed $100,000, the proprietor shall pay $15 additional.

What was the intention of the committee when it says, "if such gross receipts from sources other than sales directly to the consumer exceed $100,000 the proprietor shall pay $15 additional"? How can a doctor or a lawyer have sales directly to the consumer exceeding $100,000? The language is not well chosen and its meaning is obscure.

I withdraw any purpose to object because I think the paragraph is one that ought to be carefully treated and reformed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

This subdivision shall not apply to agriculture, to any person subject to any special tax under this section or under sections 1002, 1005, 1007, or to proprietors paying special taxes upon the business of manufacturing, rectifying, or dealing in distilled spirits, malt liquors, stills, oleomargarine, adulterated, process, or renovated butter, filled cheese, or mixed flour.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry. Is an amendment at this time in order to this paragraph, inasmuch as we have passed over subtitle (14)? I make the point of order that the part just read goes over with the first part.

Mr. WALSH. We could not very well put something over that had not been read.

Mr. DYER. This provides that this subdivision shall not apply to agriculture, and so forth. I take it that is a part of subdivision (14), and that both must be taken together. If lines 6 to 10 were stricken out, then the paragraph just read would have no meaning.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has looked at the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and that is offered as a new paragraph, which would be in order at this time, and at this point, whether the paragraph which the Clerk has just read goes over or not. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order, and the Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 144, after line 17, insert a new paragraph to read as follows:
"(15) Any person controlling and selling or leasing advertising space on any wall, building, or billboard, or in cars, trains, or other public places, or by means of electric signs, shall pay a tax of 10 per cent upon gross receipts of such business."

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve the point of order upon that. It is new matter not contained in the bill and is subject to a point of order.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, if I had had any idea that the point of order would be raised by a member of the committee against this item, I should have made a similar point against every item in this title, because they are all new matters, and one is just as subject to a point of order as another.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I am simply reserving the point of order, because the chairman of the committee is temporarily out of the Chamber.

Mr. TREADWAY. The chairman knew that I was to bring this up at this time.

Mr. GARNER. I merely reserved it for the reason that I wanted to protect his rights. If the gentleman from Massachusetts says that it is agreeable to the chairman, I shall withdraw the point of order.

Mr. TREADWAY. It is agreeable to the chairman, and he suggested that I offer it in this place.

Mr. GARNER. Very well, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not this bill provide that advertising on billboards and the like shall pay a tax under the postage provision of the bill?

Mr. TREADWAY. No; there is no postage provision in this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. That is not repealed, is it?

Mr. TREADWAY. There is no title of that kind in the bill. It is not in the present law.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it is in the present law.

Mr. TREADWAY. No; the gentleman is mistaken. It was taken out in conference or in the Senate.

Mr. GARNER. It was in the bill when it passed the House.

Mr. TREADWAY. It passed the House, and I think was taken out in the conference.

Mr. GARNER. My understanding is that it was in the bill as reported in 1917, but was stricken out in the House.

Mr. TREADWAY. So that there is no law covering any tax on billboard advertising.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I am compelled to reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois reserves the point of order.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I suggest that the gentleman from Massachusetts permit the matter to go over until to-morrow, as there seems to be some misunderstanding about it.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am willing to have the matter go over, and I made that suggestion to the chairman of the committee, but as the matter has been up in the committee he thought it best to bring it up at this time. However, I ask unanimous consent that the matter go over until to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the consideration of this amendment go over until to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I shall reserve the right to object for the time being. I do not think we ought to pass any legislation that will compel advertisers on billboards to pay a tax. That is one feature of giving publicity to news. There is no provision in this bill to compel newspapers to pay a tax, and if that be true there ought not to be anything discriminatory legislatively against the people who distribute news by billboard.

Mr. CRISP. There is no tax on advertising in newspapers.

Mr. MADDEN. The tax is on carrying the commodity, but the United States Government does not carry this commodity, and hence it ought not to levy a tax.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I have not the floor.

Mr. TREADWAY. I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. FORDNEY. There is a heavier postage rate upon printed matter in newspapers and magazines than there is on reading matter that is not advertising.

Mr. MADDEN. I have no intention to object.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I renew the request that the amendment may go over and be pending to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN. The request is still pending before the House. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. I withdraw my objection to its going over.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order, and that reservation can go over with the other.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I do this for the purpose of asking the chairman a few questions. I wish to have the attention of the chairman for a moment. This subdivision especially exempts section 1005 of this bill. Now, section 1005 provides for a tax equivalent to 1 per cent on mail-order houses in excess of $100,000. Now, according to that the mail-order house would not have to pay the $10, but the small merchant who only sold $60,000 worth a year would have to pay this $10. I would like to know why the discrimination in favor of the large mail-order house?

Mr. KITCHIN. Because they pay the 1 per cent special tax.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. They do not pay on the $100,000; they pay on the sales over the $100,000.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, they pay 1 per cent on the amount of their sales over the $100,000.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. But they do not pay on the $100,000. Here is a small merchant who only sells $60,000 a year and he pays $10 and the big mail-order house sells $100,000 before he pays anything.

Mr. KITCHIN. No, he pays 1 per cent on his sales over the $100,000.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I know, but up to $100,000 he does not pay anything at all. Why discriminate against the small merchant?

Mr. KITCHIN. He would be subject to the $10 occupation tax if he did not pay the tax under section 1005 on his sales over $100,000.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Who?

Mr. KITCHIN. The mail-order house.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. If he did not sell over $100,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. He would be subject to the $10 occupation tax if he did not sell as much as $100,000.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Suppose he sells $200,000 and pays 1 per cent on the amount over $100,000, but he is permitted to sell $100,000 worth of merchandise in competition with the small merchant before he pays anything.

Mr. KITCHIN. He pays the $10 occupation tax.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Where does he pay it?

Mr. KITCHIN. Upon his special exemption. The man pays a tax under section 1001, paragraph 14, if he does not sell as much as $100,000, and in that case he is not taxed under 1005, but under the $10 occupation-tax provision. That is very clear.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Where is he taxed under this occupation tax? The point I am making is this: If he sells over $100,000, he pays a tax on the amount over $100,000, but he does not pay anything for the sales less than $100,000.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; in that case he would pay the $10 occupation tax.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. How will he do it if you exempt him under section 1005?

Mr. KITCHIN. Unless his sales amount to over $100,000 he does not pay under that section, but he pays the $10 occupation tax.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Here is what I am trying to drive at you. You do not seem to catch my point. He must sell $100,000 worth before he begins to pay any taxes at all.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; before he pays a special tax under section 1005.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. In other words, if he sells $100,000 worth, he is exempt; if he sells $200,000 worth, he pays on the last $100,000.

Mr. KITCHIN. Unless his sales exceed $100,000, he pays no tax under section 1005, but he does pay the $10 occupation tax.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. What occupation tax?

Mr. GARNER. On page 144, clause (14).

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. It says here that that shall not apply to him—the mail-order man. The point I am trying to drive at you gentlemen is that the first $100,000 is not taxed at all under section 1005.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand that.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Why should he not pay a tax if he is permitted to compete with the small merchant that sells $65,000 or $75,000 or $90,000 worth? Why not let the small merchant have the $100,000 before you tax him $10?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will make it plain to the gentleman if he will turn to page 144. That provision taxes every proprietor of every trade, business, or profession to the amount of $10, does it not?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. And it says:

This subdivision shall not apply to agriculture, to any person subject to any special tax under this section or under sections 1002, 1005, and 1007.

Then it does not——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CHANDLER] has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, then.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman allow me to make a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DYER. As I understand—and I will ask the Chair if I am correct or not—awhile ago we passed this paragraph over until to-morrow morning by unanimous consent for the purpose of offering amendments, at the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]?

The CHAIRMAN. Paragraph 14?

Mr. DYER. Yes. We passed that over.

Mr. WALSH. You only passed over the part from lines 6 to 10, inclusive. The other had not been read at the time that was passed over.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CHANDLER] is inquiring with reference to lines 6 to 10, as to concerns that sell over $100,000 worth.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the situation. After so much of the paragraph had been read as is found between lines 6 and 10, then the motion was made to pass over until to-morrow morning, and the motion was agreed to. And then the balance of the subtitle was read, namely, line 11 down to and including line 17, and when that reading was completed the gentleman from Oklahoma moved to strike out the last word, which would be the last word of the second paragraph, and in connection with that propounded a question to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

Mr. DYER. My inquiry was as to the part that was left open.

The CHAIRMAN. That may be; but that would not be according to the order.

Mr. KITCHIN. Section 1005 levies a special tax only upon the merchant whose sales amount to over $100,000. It does not apply to merchants whose sales are less than $100,000, does it?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. No.

Mr. KITCHIN. The only man we tax under section 1005 is the one whose sales are over $100,000. The man that sells under $100,000 is not taxed at all under this provision. On page 144 the proprietors of any trade, and so forth, are taxed, but it says that this subdivision shall not apply to any person subject to any tax in section 1005. The $10 occupation tax does not apply to the man whose sales are over $100,000.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. That is just the reason.

Mr. KITCHIN. Because section 1005 taxes him, but section 1005 does not tax the person who sells under $100,000. But paragraph 14 on page 144 does tax him.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I understand that very distinctly, but here is a man who sells half a million dollars' worth of merchandise, say, and on the first $100,000 he is exempt. He is not taxed under section 1005 at all.

Mr. KITCHIN. He is taxed just like everybody else is taxed under that section.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. You exempt the mail-order house that has sold half a million dollars' worth of merchandise and pays this tax on the last $400,000, but the first $100,000 he does not pay anything on?

Mr. KITCHIN. We did not want to catch in this provision every little country merchant, everybody who sends out goods in the country on rural delivery, and therefore we exempted them from this 1 per cent tax.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. That is all very well, but you are exempting this big man.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not understand the gentleman. He is taxed exactly as is provided in the act.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. He sells $100,000 under section 1005 before he pays any tax whatever.

Mr. KITCHIN. Before he pays any tax under section 1005. He pays his tax under paragraph 14, page 144, if he does not pay the tax under section 1005.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. How does he pay it?

Mr. KITCHIN. Because the act says so. Read the language.

Mr. CHANDLER. Oh, no; it does not. He is exempt from the provision under that paragraph on page 144.

Mr. KITCHIN. A man taxed under section 1005 is exempt, but nobody else is.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Sears, Roebuck & Co. will be taxed under section 1005?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; and the man whose sales are less than $100,000 is taxed $10 under paragraph 14, page 144.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. And you give Sears, Roebuck & Co. an exemption of that first $100,000.

Mr. MADDEN. But you charge him an additional tax.

Mr. KITCHIN. I can not make the gentleman from Oklahoma understand.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I can not make the gentleman from North Carolina understand.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will leave it to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER] to explain it.

Mr. KREIDER. It is plain. Bear in mind the tax is $10 on every merchant, big or little, up to $100,000. Now, $15 is added, on page 144, when it goes over $100,000, but if a man is caught in the tax provided for in section 1005 he pays 1 per cent.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. For the amount over $100,000.

Mr. KREIDER. And when the 1 per cent amounts to less than the $15 and the $10, then he falls under paragraph 14. Now, it is only a question as to which section he is taxed under. The larger amount of business he does the higher his tax.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. That is all very plain, but you have got the first $100,000 that that man sells that he does not pay any tax at all on, because he is especially exempted here.

Mr. KITCHIN. I suggest to the gentleman from Oklahoma that he make his proposition clear to the House by offering an amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I can do that by striking out 1005, on page 144. Let him pay the $10, and then when he gets up to $100,000 let him pay the additional 1 per cent.

Mr. KITCHIN. You would strike out the tax of catalogue houses?

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. No; I would eliminate their exemption.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. KITCHIN. If I have any time left, Mr. Chairman, I yield it to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not care to use any time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina has now yielded the floor, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1006. That 60 days after the passage of this act, and thereafter on July 1 in each year, and also at the time of the purchase of a new or used automobile or motorcycle by a user, if on any other date than July 1, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid, upon the use of automobiles and motorcycles, a special excise tax at rates as follows: Motorcycles, $5; automobiles (other than electric) of 23 horsepower or less, $10; more than 23 horsepower and not more than 30 horsepower, $20; more than 30 horsepower and not more than 40 horsepower, $30; and more than 40 horsepower, $50; electric automobiles, $5 per horsepower and 50 cents for each 100 pounds of weight.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, section 1006, having to do with the tax on automobiles, was one of the subjects of great discussion in the committee. I think if there was any one thing we changed more frequently than another it was this. It seems to be that the method finally adopted by the committee has but one reason in its favor, and that is the tax by States on automobiles is based on horsepower.

I maintained and I still feel that the proper way of taxing automobiles, so far as this revenue bill is concerned, should be based on the value of the car. There is no connection for the tax purposes of this bill between the proposed tax and what the horsepower of a car may be or may not be. In the case of a man buying an automobile five years ago and selling that car to-day, the horsepower is continued to the next owner, who, if he could afford it, would undoubtedly have bought a new car rather than a second-hand one or a third-hand one, valued not to exceed probably at this time 50 per cent of its original value. It should be a valuation tax, not a horsepower tax. The people most familiar with the automobile subject, namely, the highway commissioners of the various States, are, I am quite sure, opposed to this method of levying the tax.

I have here the following letter from the Highway Commission of Massachusetts opposing this tax scheme:

SEPTEMBER 7, 1918.

To the honorable COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: The Massachusetts Highway Commission has charge of the registration of motor vehicles in the State of Massachusetts, and the registration and license fees are used for the maintenance of the State highways, these fees providing practically all of the money used for that purpose.

The registration fee is based on the horsepower of the vehicle, this being the fairest way of representing the damage done to the roads, thereby requiring the owners of the cars, to a certain extent, to pay for the damage actually done to the roads by such vehicles.

The commission has been informed that there is a bill before Congress providing for the taxation of automobiles on a horsepower basis. It appears to the commission that such a method of fixing this tax is unfair, as it would be no criterion of the value of the cars, and would result in fixing the same tax on an old car, which had depreciated, as upon a new car. Some cars, particularly the large and high-priced cars, have little or no value after two or three years, especially at the present time; for instance, the present selling price of a 4-year-old $4,000 car is about $200

Therefore the commission feels that it should protest against any tax on automobiles which does not take into account the value of the vehicle, and that before any schedule is adopted the matter of depreciation should be taken into account.

It respectfully suggests that the schedule of insurance or the "second-hand car lists," as issued by the National Association of Automobile Dealers, be used as a basis of taxation.

Respectfully,
F. I. BIELER,
Secretary.

There is nothing logical about this tax scheme except, as I have already said, that the people understand taxation by horsepower. In the next paragraph of this same section we describe the method of determining the horsepower. That is an entirely arbitrary rule of the Treasury Department, which might or might not be the same method used in the various States. Probably it is not. Consequently, it seems to me that we should frame this tax on the value rather than on the horsepower of automobiles.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman favors taxation on the value of automobiles. How would the gentleman have the value of an automobile determined, and by whom?

Mr. TREADWAY. The value was determined in the last revenue bill by allowing a depreciation of 10 per cent for each year, to be deducted from the original cost price, up to 50 per cent, which would seem to be a very fair and proper manner of establishing that depreciation value.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. DYER. I notice that section 1006 imposes a tax of $5 per horsepower on electric automobiles. What would be the tax on an electric automobile that can not be operated, which has no horsepower because it will not run?

Mr. TREADWAY. I should say the way to find that out would be to buy new batteries.

Mr. DYER. Would it be fair to tax an automobile that was standing in a garage that could not be taken out and used?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will look at line 18, on page 148, he will see that the tax is upon the use of automobiles. If a man leaves it in the garage through the year, he does not get any use of it and it is not taxable.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. I ask unanimous consent for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that his time be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. I wish to state that I am perfectly willing to abide by the decision of the majority of the committee, as we always do, of course; but I do think this method is entirely illogical and wrong and should be changed, and that the tax should be based on valuation rather than on the horsepower. But I do not offer any amendment.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to ask the chairman of the committee [Mr. KITCHIN], or anyone who is familiar with the horsepower of electric automobiles, what is the average horsepower of an electric?

Mr. KITCHIN. The average is about four horsepower. That was discussed in our committee, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], who happens to be out of the Hall at this moment, took it up the next day with two or three gentlemen who handle electric cars, and they told him the average was about four horsepower.

Mr. KREIDER. I thought they might be rated at 10 or 15 horsepower, which would run the tax up out of all proportion to that paid by gasoline automobiles.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; it was discussed between two members of the committee. One thought it was not to exceed four or five horsepower, and another thought it was just like any other motor car. They went down town the next day and found that the average was about four horsepower.

Mr. SNYDER. I should like to ask the chairman a question as to a man who has had an automobile for a year or two, who does not see fit to use it during the period of a year?

Mr. KITCHIN. He would put it up, and if he did not use it he would not be taxed on it.

Mr. WALSH. He would not?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; he could not be.

Mr. WALSH. Why not?

Mr. KITCHIN. The Supreme Court has held that a license tax on an article not used is a direct tax. This is a tax on the use, and not on the automobile itself.

Mr. SNYDER. Then, as I understand the chairman, if a man owns an automobile and does not use it, he does not have to pay the tax.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; the tax is not on the ownership; it is on the use of it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, as I understand, the question is whether this tax applies to unused cars. The members of the committee seem to differ as to that. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY]——

Mr. TREADWAY. If the gentleman will permit, if he will read lines 18 and 19, it says, "There shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid on the use of automobiles," and so forth. If the car is laid up and left in the garage, it would not be taxed.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am not sure that it does not apply to a car whether it is in use or not.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman will permit, we have no right to impose a tax on the property of the automobile; it is a tax on the use. If it is used any time during the year it is subject to be taxed.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then, if, as the gentleman from Massachusetts says, you take the old electric out once a year, it would be subject to the tax?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is true. The ruling of the Treasury Department with reference to yachts is that, say, within 60 days a man must pay the tax, and if he declares that it is not his intention to use the yacht during the year they do not collect the tax; but if he does use it afterwards he must pay the tax.

Mr. SNYDER. But there is nothing here that says a man must declare his intention not to use it.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; that is in the case of yachts that I am speaking of.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word to ask if this section may not be passed over. I am deeply impressed with the idea that the tax here provided on automobiles is not a proper way to tax automobiles, and I ask permission of the House that this go over until to-morrow.

Mr. FOSTER. I shall object to that.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say that people are accustomed to this method of taxing automobiles; they understand it, and more than three-quarters of the States have the horsepower tax. It is easily administered and it is the better method of taxing cars. The principle upon which the States impose the automobile tax is that it is a road tax. Most of them tax them according to their horsepower. An automobile of 40 horsepower worth $200, a secondhand car, will tear up the road and injure the road just as much as a $2,000 new car. Since the United States Government has appropriated money for building public roads in the States we thought that we had better apply the same principle that the States apply. This tax is practically a road tax. We could apply it absolutely to a road fund, but we are going to appropriate more in the future than this will bring in.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Does the gentleman object to this going over until to-morrow?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; it would probably take up two hours to-morrow morning, when Members come in fresh and want to discuss it. If the gentleman wants to offer an amendment, let him offer it now.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say that the simplest way in the world to tax automobiles is this method provided for in the bill. If you undertake to tax them upon their value, there will be a row about the value of every automobile. This is the scientific method.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Colorado yield?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to say, as a matter of information, that the tax on the value of the cars was provided for in an amendment that was agreed to in the Senate when the last revenue bill was under consideration. It was a popular tax on that side of Congress. That matter was discussed in the committee, but the majority of the committee did not favor the Senate plan, knowing, I think, full well that the Senate probably would raise this very question.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will also say that the conferees upon the revenue bill of 1917 discussed the automobile license tax on the basis of value and struck it out.

Mr. SNYDER. Let me say that this is the method of collecting the tax in the State of New York, and I think it is the only proper way.

Mr. KITCHIN. This is practically a road tax.

Mr. SNYDER. It operates very successfully in the State of New York.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee one question. A good many of the Members have received wires from dealers in secondhand automobiles. Three or four lie on my desk at the present time. The complaint was that a $200 machine of 40 horsepower would pay the same tax as a $5,000 machine would pay for similar horsepower. The question I want to ask is, While a machine is in the hands of a secondhand dealer for repairs or equipment or for resale, is it subject to the tax?

Mr. KITCHIN. When a man buys it he will have to pay the license tax for the use of it. He is not subject to the sales tax.

Mr. ELSTON. That would fall on the owner as soon as he got it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Just as soon as he got the machine.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have been in the Committee on Appropriations all day, but I understand the committee is now on the tax on automobiles. I have several friends who own automobiles, and I have one myself; but it is put in storage, and I do not expect to use it in the next year. I do not suppose that I can sell it. I could not get a chauffeur. I lost mine in the draft.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, the gentleman is young enough to run the machine himself.

Mr. CANNON. I do not know how to run it myself, and there you are.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman would not have to pay the tax if he did not use it. The tax is on the use of it.

Mr. ELSTON. How about selling a machine three or four times over in the same year? Would the new user each time have to pay the tax, so that there would be an accumulation of taxes in that way?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly; if he is going to use the automobile.

Mr. ELSTON. I am speaking of the same automobile changing hands four or five times in the same year. Would each new user have to pay the tax?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly; it would be just the same as different tenants occupying a store. There is a new licensee each time.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose I use a machine only 1 month in 12.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman then would have to pay the tax.

Mr. CANNON. Then I shall make my friend poor by giving him mine. [Laughter.]

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman will be very lucky if he can get him to accept it.

The Clerk read as follows:

SECTION 1. That on and after January 1, 1919, every person who imports, manufactures, produces, compounds, sells, deals in, dispenses, or gives away opium or coca leaves, or any compound, manufacture, salt, derivative or preparation thereof, shall register with the collector of internal revenue of the district his name or style, place of business and place or places where such business is to be carried on, and on or before the 1st day of July, annually thereafter, and pay special taxes as follows:

Importers, manufacturers, producers, or compounders, $24 per annum; wholesale dealers, $12 per annum; retail dealers, $6 per annum; physicians, dentists, veterinary surgeons, and other practitioners lawfully entitled to distribute, dispense, give away, or administer any of the aforesaid drugs to patients upon whom they are in attendance, shall pay $3 per annum.

Every person who imports, manufactures, compounds, or otherwise produces for sale or distribution any of the aforesaid drugs shall be deemed to be an importer, manufacturer, or producer.

Every person who sells or offers for sale any of said drugs in the original stamped packages, as hereinafter provided, shall be deemed a wholesale dealer.

Every person who sells or dispenses from original stamped packages as hereinafter provided, shall be deemed a retail dealer: Provided, That the office, or if none, the residence, of any person shall be considered for the purpose of this act his place of business; but no employee of any person who has registered and paid special tax as herein required, acting within the scope of his employment, shall be required to register and pay special tax provided by this section: Provided further, That officials of the United States, Territorial, District of Columbia, or insular possessions, State or municipal governments, who in the exercise of their official duties engage in any of the business herein described, shall not be required to register, nor pay special tax, nor stamp the aforesaid drugs as hereinafter prescribed, but their right to this exemption shall be evidenced in such manner as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may by regulations prescribe.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, as I desire to ask some questions about this feature of the bill, and I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] is particularly familiar with it, for I believe he has the credit of having rewritten this act and making it more effective. My understanding is that one of the chief difficulties in convicting these drug peddlers in the big cities is to prove that they are dealers in drugs. The fact that a man has in his possession an undue quantity of these drugs and is otherwise a vagrant or a man of no particular occupation, and probably certainly a drug peddler, is not sufficient to convict him under the decisions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. That is correct.

Mr. BORLAND. I notice this law is strengthened to this extent of providing that every person who sells or dispenses, and so forth, shall be considered a retail dealer. Is there any possibility of strengthening the law so as to provide that the possession of a certain quantity of drugs shall be evidence of a retail dealer or a purpose to sell the same?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. That has been discussed, and that is one of the matters that has been under consideration. The reason for rewriting this section of the Harrison Act is the opinion in the Gin Fuey Moy case, with which the gentleman is probably familiar.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. In that case the United States Supreme Court holds that the Harrison Act, if it can be enforced at all, must be enforced as a revenue measure, and since that opinion was rendered the Federal courts throughout the country, one by one, have commenced to follow it. As a result it leaves practically no protection at all against the bootleggers. The quantity of drugs that may be found in possession of an illicit dealer has been considered, but it would be extremely difficult to determine whether he is a dealer or not under the law, on account of the fact that he carries a certain amount of drugs. They smuggle in opium and mix it with milk sugar and carry it around with them in the nighttime in small packages and sell it on the streets to addicts who tender the proper amount of money and are handed the little red or blue or green package, as the case may be.

The department has had the matter under careful consideration, as also has a committee appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, to investigate the question of addicts and the prevalence of narcotic habits, and whether the number of addicts is increasing. That committee is composed, with one exception, of scientific men, and they have reached the conclusion that the best way to remedy this is to bring the law entirely under revenue provisions, and all over the country district attorneys have been consulted in the matter as well as the officials charged with the enforcement of the Harrison Act, and I presume I have in my possession four or five hundred letters from those various officials. The consensus of opinion is that the way to do it is the way in which we have attempted to do it here. Of course, the Harrison Act as it stands now is practically ineffective, or soon will be.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, this Harrison Drug Act, of course, is based only upon the idea of revenue. That is, it is a revenue measure, and the police power is only incidental to force the payment of the revenue. That is the legal status of the matter, and it can not be enforced as a police regulation directly against the dealing in these noxious drugs.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. That is the matter for the States.

Mr. BORLAND. But, unfortunately, the interstate traffic in these drugs has become enormous, and the whole business is based upon interstate traffic, because the drugs are not a local product of many of our States. It is an evil that peculiarly affects the cities, not because people in cities are more addicted to the use of drugs than are other people, but because drug addicts always go to the cities.

They always go to the cities or the surrounding towns. One evil that presses upon the cities is the fact of the increased burden upon the cities of providing hospital facilities and cures and municipal farms and all that sort of thing for a very large section of the country which is tributary to that big commercial city. Now, it has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States before a man can be subjected to a revenue tax and punished for not paying a dealer's tax he must be a dealer in an article, and the fact he has in his possession an unusual amount of opium or cocaine and that he is a man of no apparent occupation and an otherwise suspicious character is of no proving force at all. It does not prove that he is a dealer in an article, and therefore he can not be convicted by a Federal court. Now, there has been a very great effort by the social reformers to see whether this law could not be strengthened. My judgment—I talked the matter over with our United States district attorney and United States district judge—in my judgment it would have to be turned into a police regulation in order to enforce it fully; but this present act, I have no doubt, strengthens some features of that law——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BORLAND. Eventually this Congress must do with the obnoxious drug habit what it is seeking to do with intoxicating liquors, to wit, put it under police regulation prohibition. The indulgence in the habit is growing and some people claim it is one of the by-products of prohibition. Whether or not it is we do not know, but unquestionably it is growing in this country. It is based entirely upon interstate traffic. There is no such thing as a local traffic in the sale of these noxious drugs. These men come across the State lines. The way in which it is done is this: Some big fellow who is occupied in the business gets a satchel full of the stuff from some wholesale druggist whose conscience allows him to do business that way and takes that satchel full of stuff in a city. There he meets at some low hotel his runners, men and women, and they are given packages.

The color of the packages, as the gentleman from Illinois said, might indicate the contents. Cocaine may be in green and opium in blue or some other form that is well known to the habitués of those places. These runners go out into the red-light district and other sections of the city and have a regular-fixed route. Say, at 10 o'clock at night, at a certain corner, the drug addicts know a man will be there and have a few of these packages in his pocket. They go and hand him 50 cents or a dollar and he hands out a package. Or he goes to a house in the lower section of the city, and his coming is known like the coming of the milkman or the boy who delivers the paper. Now, that traffic is all interstate commerce; but apparently this question of levying a tax upon it by the Federal Government, which was designed to put it under regulation and control, at least by the Federal Government, those who are dealing in this article have not reached down far enough. It is going to be necessary for this Congress, I take it, to provide an interstate regulation and, above all, legislation based upon the power of Congress over interstate traffic entirely to control the traffic in these drugs, except in the hands of certain physicians and registered pharmacists, who are of professional standing under the law. They are the only people who ought to be allowed to handle these drugs. Any man who is not a registered pharmacist or registered physician according to the law of the State, who is found with those drugs in his possession, is prima facie guilty of one of the most damnable outrages against society that can be had. [Applause.] I undertake to say it will be necessary to go further. The Harrison law, supplemented by the Rainey Act, is going to develop, as I believe, where the real source of this evil is, and I hope if my opportunity does not serve, the opportunity of some other gentleman in this House will serve to put through an act to control the interstate traffic in drugs and keep it in the hands of licensed physicians and pharmacists. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to the argument presented by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], and I agree with him that the Harrison Act, even revamped as we are attempting now to do, will not sufficiently meet the situation presented in this country at the present time.

They are smuggling opium into the country in enormous quantities. I have evidence here on my desk which shows it is brought in by stokers on troopships. These men enlist as stokers, and they buy the opium abroad and bring it in without any trouble at all. Their baggage is not inspected after the first day. The ship lies at the wharf, and they may secrete a thousand dollars' worth of opium in their working clothes and carry it onto the wharf, and in that way it reaches the hands of the bootleggers. This is only one of many ways in which it reaches the country. Two dollars' worth of derivatives of opium mixed with milk sugar and distributed by bootleggers brings from the ultimate consumer $30 or $35 in money.

WAR ALWAYS INCREASES NUMBER OF ADDICTS.

As a result of war the number of addicts always increases. During our Civil War and before our Civil War we did not have many addicts in the United States. After that men who were wounded, families who had been deprived of some important member, quickly acquired the habit of taking narcotics. We are plunged now into the most horrible war in history, in which four or five millions of our young men will be engaged, and the number of addicts is increasing all the time. The Harrison Act has had the effect of restricting the importation of opium. Opium comes in in larger amounts and it is easier to detect it. You can smoke opium and live to a great age, but you can not use heroin and morphine and these other derivatives of opium and cocoa leaves and live very long, especially if the narcotic you use is heroin.

THE TREASURY COMMITTEE.

A committee appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, consisting entirely of scientific men, except one—and the one man who is not a scientific man is the chairman of the committee, and he happens to be myself—has been engaged since last June studying this problem. About the only thing the Harrison Act does for us is to enable us to locate the known addicts—that is, those who have been treated by physicians and who have admitted to the physicians that they are addicts and whom physicians have admitted are addicts.

Physicians must, under the law, register their names. And we find as a result of computations and estimates as far as we have gone with the investigation that there are in all probability in the United States at the present day 1,500,000 drug addicts, every one of them needing treatment. There were 80,000 drug addicts in the first draft, and they are all being rejected now by the camp officers, and those who found their way to camp are being sent back as incompetents. We find that young men are acquiring this habit in order to escape the draft. I have a list here of 25 physicians who have been commissioned as captains and majors in the Army of the United States who are drug addicts and known drug addicts. I have the name of a physician, himself an addict, who started to his post in France carrying with him a large amount of narcotics to hand out to soldiers in France.

Sixty per cent of the addicts in the city of Baltimore are of draft age. There are 200,000 addicts in the city of New York. Now, the country is going dry at the present time. We have the names of 8,000 young men in New York City between the ages of 21 and 31 who are drug addicts. Alcoholism is a disease and must be treated. If you take away from an alcoholic the liquor he has been using, he may go to dope and become a dope fiend.

PROHIBITION AND USE OF NARCOTICS.

The opponents of prohibition are commencing to call attention to the increase in the number of drug addicts and are insisting that the increase is greater in dry sections of the country, and they are also vigorously insisting that the suspension for the period of the war of the manufacture and sale of all liquors containing alcohol will have the effect of driving people who have been accustomed to the use of liquors in quantities too large to drugs. If they are right about it, then the reason for strengthening the Harrison Act at the present time is most urgent.

THE REVENUE FEATURES OF THE NARCOTIC SECTIONS.

It is estimated that the amendments proposed in this bill to the Harrison Act will yield a revenue of $3,500,000 a year, a very considerable amount; and if there were no other reason for these amendments this reason would be ample. On the 5th day of June, 1916, at the October term of 1915, the Supreme Court of the United States rendered an opinion in the case of the United States against Jin Fuey Moy. This case came to the Supreme Court from the western district of Pennsylvania. In discussing the Harrison Act, the Supreme Court, referring to the opinion of the district court, said:

> It may be assumed that the statute has a moral end as well as revenue in view, but we are of the opinion that the district court in treating those ends as to be reached only through a revenue measure, and within the limits of a revenue measure, was right.

The only revenue feature contained in the Harrison Act was contained in section 1, where an annual tax of $1 per annum is imposed on all persons who produce, manufacture, import, and so forth, opium or coca leaves or their derivatives. Another decision to the same effect is that of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit in the case of Arthur L. Blunt, wherein the court followed the opinion in the Jin Fuey Moy case. In both of these decisions the court indicated that police powers could be exercised only in so far as necessary and incidental to the revenue provisions.

PROVISIONS CONTAINED IN PROPOSED AMENDMENTS.

Section 1 of the Harrison Act—the act of December 17, 1914—is rewritten. The special taxes are substantially increased so the physicians pay $3 per annum, importers and manufacturers $24 per annum, wholesalers $12 per annum, and retail dealers $6 per annum. Stamps are required upon all packages containing the drugs in question, and the amended section makes it unlawful for any person to purchase, sell, or distribute any of the drugs described in the act except in the original stamped package, or from the original stamped package, and severe penalties are provided for violation of the section. All the provisions of existing laws relating to destruction and cancellation of tax-paid stamps are carried into the act. At the present time a sale of narcotics by an unregistered person must be actually proven before conviction can be had, no matter how large a quantity of drugs is found on his person or under his control. Bootleggers get their supplies from unauthorized sources. It is difficult to detect them in the act of making a sale, and it is also difficult to get their customers to testify against them. Under this proposed amendment, if unstamped packages containing drugs are found in the possession of illegal traffickers, it will be possible to apply to them the penalties of the act.

SECTION 6 OF THE HARRISON ACT AMENDED.

Under this section, which has come to be known as the "joker" of the Harrison Act and which was put in at the earnest insistence of the drug lobby, it has been possible to sell alleged remedies which do not contain more than 2 grains of opium, or more than one-fourth grain of morphine, or more than one-eighth grain of heroin, or more than 1 grain of codine to each avoirdupois ounce, and these alleged remedies can be sold in any drug store or in any grocery store throughout the country, and they are sold in enormous quantities, and the sale of remedies of this character is increasing in dry territory. When war prohibition is enforced we can expect the sales of these so-called "cough remedies" and "cholera-morbus cures" to increase enormously.

I have here a small bottle which contains Bateman's Pectoral Drops. This alleged remedy is made in many places in the United States. Anyone can make it and anyone can sell it. This bottle contains 45 per cent in volume of pure alcohol and it also contains 1.9 grains of opium. Here is another make of Bateman's Drops which contains 42 per cent of alcohol and 1.9 grains of opium. Here is another make of Bateman's Drops. This small bottle contains 48 per cent of alcohol and 2 grains of opium. This small bottle labeled "Paregoric" contains in each fluid ounce 1.83 grains of opium and contains 47 per cent of alcohol.

Here is a bottle of Godfrey's Cordial, which contains for each fluid ounce 5 per cent of alcohol in volume and 1.6 grains of opium. Each of these bottles contains one good drink of whisky, and in addition to that each bottle contains nearly 2 grains of opium. Some of these bottles contain quite 2 grains of opium.

Under the permission granted by Congress in the Harrison Act in the section I am discussing these combinations of whisky and opium can be sold by any person without any restraint whatever in any section of the United States, whether that section be dry or wet, and in the dry sections the sale of this stuff is steadily increasing.

SALE OF ALCOHOL AND OPIUM PROFITABLE TO DEALERS.

I have before me a letter written on the 25th day of October, 1916, by W. M. McCormick, president of McCormick & Co., of Baltimore, large manufacturing druggists, addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, calling attention to the abuse of such goods as Bateman's Drops, Godfrey's Cordial, Turlington's Balsam, paregoric, and similar remedies, not only by druggists throughout the United States, but by grocers, and in this communication this Baltimore firm patriotically advises the discontinuance of the sale of these alleged remedies entirely, although Mr. McCormick says his firm would lose money. It is interesting to note that in 1915 this firm sold of Bateman's Drops, paregoric, and Godfrey's Cordial 2,585 gallons. In 1917, as the country about Baltimore went dry, sales of these alleged remedies by this Baltimore firm increased to 4,803 gallons, and from January 1, 1918, to August 20, 1918, this firm sold of these three remedies 1,714 gallons. The change of sentiment on the part of McCormick & Co. as their profits increased from the sale of these remedies is interesting. I have before me another letter written by this firm and addressed to me, dated August 22, 1918, in which, referring to my proposed amendments and to the elimination of section 6, they say:

We desire to register our vigorous protest against the enactment of this law. If such a bill as this is passed it will cut off from the use of the people throughout the country a very large proportion of remedies which are not harmful and which are absolutely necessary to their health and welfare. If passed, it will cut off diarrhea cures, cough mixtures, cramp mixtures, paregoric, and a host of other useful harmless remedies which can not bring about drug addiction. * * * A world of harm would be done to our people.

McCormick & Co. are wholesale dealers in drugs and are manufacturing chemists. There are many other firms equally important in the United States whose business has been largely increased under section 6 of the Harrison Act and whose profits when the country goes dry will be still further increased if this section remains in the bill. Not one of these firms are protesting against the increase in the drug taxes proposed in these amendments. They do not seem to care what the tax is. No objection has been made to the amendment of section 1. The protest is against the elimination of section 6. They are all willing that goods sold under section 6 be taxed, and they do not seem to care in what amount, if they are permitted to continue the manufacture and sale of these alcohol and opium combinations.

PROHIBITION FOR PERIOD OF WAR.

Within a few days this House will almost unanimously adopt prohibition for the period of the war. No man on this floor can vote to stop the manufacture and sale of whisky, to stop the manufacture and sale of beer which contains now a mere trace of alcohol, to stop the manufacture and sale of wine which contains less alcohol than any of these dope preparations, and at the same time permit the sale of these alcohol and opium combinations. Congress must stop the indiscriminate and unrestrained sale of these remedies before the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors stop in the United States. If we are to get along without being a nation of dope fiends, we must stop the unrestrained sale throughout the United States of the alleged remedies I am discussing, and the only way to stop it is to repeal the provisions of section 6, which make possible these sales. After the country goes dry, this great Government can not occupy the position of permitting the indiscriminate sale of alcohol in the United States provided it contains less than two grains of opium to the avoirdupois ounce.

The repeal of section 6 in this particular will not stop the sale of these remedies if they are of value. They can still be obtained for a proper purpose by applying to a reputable physician.

It is contended that the proviso in section 6 limits the sale of these alleged remedies and preparations to medicinal purposes, and that they must not be sold for the purpose of evading the intention and provisions of the act. Nothing can be more absurd than this contention. We might as well stop the manufacture of liquors with the proviso that they could still be sold as medicine by any person in the United States, provided the liquors are sold as medicines and not for the purpose of evading the provisions of any act we may pass. How effective would a provision of this kind be with reference to whisky? The contention is too absurd to be entitled to serious consideration.

THE DRUG LOBBY IN WASHINGTON.

There is in the city of Washington a drug lobby—most active and vigorous. It resumed its activities a few hours after I introduced a bill, which is a part of the bill we are considering. Back of it are the great drug interests of the country. The head of the drug lobby in Washington, who has already commenced the fight for the retention of section (6), on the 15th day of April, 1916, made a speech at a dinner given by the Chicago Retail Druggists' Association, in which he is reported in the News, the organ of the Chicago association, as having said:

There is no sentiment in Congress; it is a cold-blooded proposition with the Members. The only way to appeal to them is through votes or through influence of voters.

The article in the News proceeds as follows:

Most interesting was the way in which he described how the Harrison narcotic law first originated in the mind of Dr. Hamilton Wright, but greatly changed and modified by the N. A. R. D. before it was put into such shape that it could hope for passage.

Members of Congress who have heard from druggists throughout the land understand now that this leader of the drug lobby in Washington has commenced operating along the lines laid down in his Chicago speech.

SENATOR LANE'S ARGUMENT AGAINST SECTION 6.

When the Harrison Act was up in the Senate on the 5th day of August, 1914, Senator Lane, himself a physician, denounced most vigorously section 6 and referred to it as that section under which 10,000 babies a year, and more than that, would be slowly tortured to death. He called attention to the fact that under it any irresponsible, ignorant woman, no matter how well-meaning and kindly, could give opium to little children in so-called soothing sirup remedies, but the statement was made in the Senate that the act could not pass if section 6 was eliminated from the bill, and so section 6 went into the bill, and under it these sales, ever increasing in volume, have been possible.

POSITION TAKEN BY THE PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

Immediately after I introduced the bill to amend the Harrison Narcotic Act I addressed a letter to Gen. Rupert Blue, Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service, sending him my bill and asking for his opinion on the subject, particularly calling his attention to the proposed elimination of section 6. I received from him, under date of August 25, 1918, the following reply:

MY DEAR MR. RAINEY: I have carefully considered the bill, H. R. 12787, introduced by you to amend the Harrison Narcotic Act. I realize thoroughly the difficulties which attend the devising of an ideal measure of this kind. Nevertheless, I am of the opinion that the bill, as introduced by you, gives the Government much better supervision and control of the production and sale of narcotics in the United States than the present act.

I have long been convinced of the injury which has been caused by the unrestricted sale of compounds containing small quantities of narcotic drugs. I am, therefore, in favor of the proposed elimination of section 6 of the present act. I feel that the slight inconvenience caused by the repeal of this section will be very greatly outweighed by the benefits to national health which will be secured.

I am, very truly, yours,

RUPERT BLUE,
Surgeon General.

It appears from this letter that the Public Health Service of the United States is fully alive to the dangers of the permission to sell alcohol and opium contained in this section. The section, in fact, amounts to a Government license to any person in the United States to sell at any time a combination of alcohol and opium, provided there is in it no more than 2 grains of opium to the ounce.

Twice the Treasury Department has recommended the repeal of section 6, and these amendments meet with the approval of the officials of the Treasury Department. The proposed amendments were drafted substantially as they now are in the Internal-Revenue Department. I have made some changes in them which do not materially alter the sections as they were originally drafted, and the changes I have made meet with the approval of the department.

Sections 1010 and 1011 further amend the Harrison law by permitting all opium and coca leaves, their salts and derivatives, which have been seized by officers of the United States, and which have been confiscated under the law, to be delivered for medical or scientific purposes to any department or agency of the Government under certain proper restrictions. The reason for these sections is found in the fact that there is at the present time in the possession of the Government over $100,000 worth of opium and its derivatives taken away from bootleggers by Government officials. Under existing laws there is no authority for the disposition of this large amount of narcotics, and these sections have been drawn in order to permit narcotics heretofore seized, or hereafter seized, to be used in such Government hospitals or in such other places as the proper Government officials may designate.

The Clerk read as follows:

Title XI—Stamp taxes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, is this the title of the bill in which there is but one change in the tax?

Mr. KITCHIN. One change in the stamp tax on playing cards, from 7 cents to 8 cents, and we added afterwards certificates of stock and certificates of profit.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think we ought to consider such an important change as that to-night?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think we will finish that in 15 minutes. As I said, there are but two changes. Let us run until 6 o'clock.

The Clerk read as follows:

6. Drafts or checks (payable otherwise than at sight or on demand) upon their acceptance or delivery within the United States, whichever is prior, promissory notes, except bank notes issued for circulation, and for each renewal of the same, for a sum not exceeding $100, 2 cents; and for each additional $100 or fractional part thereof, 2 cents.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on lines 19 and 20 of page 167, the words "payable otherwise than at sight or on demand."

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand that is to put a stamp on checks?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 167, line 19, after the word "checks," strike out the words "payable otherwise than at sight or on demand."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that when we are attempting to raise such a large sum of money, with the threatened loss of such a considerable amount, owing to the Executive order and the probable action of the legislative branch upon certain matters in the future, here is an excellent field for raising a vast amount of revenue.

The only objection that I have heard made to it is that certain of the small banks throughout the country contend they would lose some of their deposits, and that people would not be patriotic enough after the tax were put on bank checks to pay bills by check, but would draw out what their indebtedness might be for the month in one sum and pay it in cash or coin. It seems that in view of the experience we had during the Spanish-American War days in raising revenue from this source it would be well to return to it.

Now, if the small banks object to it and are going to lose the deposits which they claim they will lose, it seems to me we will make it up in the larger banks of the country. I doubt if there ever was a time in our history when so many transactions were going through the banks and clearing houses and so much business was being done in which checks were being used.

I assume that, because we have been content to stay here until this late hour without objection, the chairman will be willing to accept the amendment I have offered.

Mr. KITCHIN. Neither the chairman nor the committee could possibly accept that amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state what he stated the other day?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not want to put a tax on bank deposits. Will the gentleman withdraw that amendment out of the kindness of his heart?

Mr. WALSH. No; I can not withdraw it, and I do not know but that we ought to have a quorum here to decide the question.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let us just take a vote on it.

Mr. WALSH. You mean, put it to rest and then go on. [Laughter.]

Seriously speaking, has the gentleman any figures as to what the probable revenue would be from a tax of this sort?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think it is estimated at about $18,000,000.

Mr. WALSH. Eighteen million dollars?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think about $18,000,000 now that you would get from it. If you had a graduated tax, you could get almost anything you wanted—$60,000,000 or $100,000,000. But if you graduated it you would find the big banks would protest then.

Mr. WALSH. The amendment that I have offered makes it a graduated tax.

Mr. KITCHIN. If you had a graduated tax, I think you would find not only the little banks but the big banks would protest. The big banks would protest more than the little ones.

Mr. WALSH. The big banks?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Of course that is their privilege. But we need the revenue. A lot of other people are going to protest against taxes in this bill, but you are going to impose them nevertheless, and the people have to pay them. Now, banks, both big and little, doing profitable business ought to contribute to the support of the war.

Mr. KITCHIN. The banks themselves will not pay it. The depositors will pay it. The banks will protest against it, because the deposits will be drawn out. I think when the banks are doing such great service in the war as they are doing now no obstacle should be put in the way of placing money in the banks.

Mr. WALSH. I question the brand of patriotism that will refuse to pay a legitimate tax which we have had heretofore in the history of this country and which resulted in raising a lot of revenue.

Mr. KITCHIN. And the first thing that Congress did after the Spanish-American War was to take it off, and Congress, or at least the House, three times in the last six years has voted almost unanimously against imposing a tax on bank checks.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will permit me, I think the gentleman from North Carolina misapprehended his question.

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think the gentleman from North Carolina understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to ask what it was estimated the flat 2-cent rate would raise, not what a rate of 2 cents and 2 additional cents on each $100 would raise.

Mr. KITCHIN. That has not been estimated. I thought the gentleman referred to the flat 2-cent rate.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think the tax at the graduated rate would be a very large amount.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman realizes that it would oblige everyone to carry a set of stamps along with his check book, because he could not tell how many stamps he would have to put on until the occasion rose to draw a check.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, that would be quite a hardship, to carry half a dozen stamps in your vest pocket. You might get lopsided transporting such a burden. It would not be any more of a hardship than to carry a few postage stamps in your vest pocket for the purpose of posting letters.

Mr. ROBBINS. This would be a tax of 20 cents on a $1,000 check.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Does not that appeal to the gentleman as being an exorbitant tax, in view of the other high taxes and in view of the great service that the banks of the country are rendering free in the present war?

Mr. WALSH. No; I do not think it is. The banks are not paying it. Why do gentlemen drag in the banks and the question of the patriotic services that they are rendering? They are no more patriotic than is the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or any other Member of this House, or any other class of business. They are trying to do the best they can, and the banks are not going to pay this tax on checks. The only kick the banks are making, as I understand, comes from some of the smaller banks, which fear that they may lose some of their deposits. That was not the experience of the country when this tax was imposed in the Spanish War.

Mr. KITCHIN. That was a flat rate, then, of 2 cents a check.

Mr. WALSH. The experience then was that the deposits, as I am informed, did not fall off to any such alarming extent. Of course, if the gradation for each $100 is too severe, that can be modified to make it 1 cent for each $100 after the first $100; but I submit that here is a chance to raise at least $18,000,000, and with the gradation it will raise at least three times that amount.

Mr. KITCHIN. You really could raise a great deal of money by putting a tax of 2 cents on every transfer of a dollar bill, or 2 cents upon each $100 or fractional part thereof, or a tax of 1 cent on every transfer of half a dollar.

Mr. WALSH. I did not strike that out. The committee provided for that exception, and I am content.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let us have a vote.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, it plainly appears there is no way of avoiding the offering of ridiculous and untimely amendments by prominent and distinguished Members of this House. As the gentleman from Massachusetts has said, a tax of the kind his amendment would create would raise a large amount of money. And so would a tax of 2 cents on every time one breathes raise a large amount. A tax of 2 cents on every slice of bread one eats would raise a large amount, and a tax of 2 cents every time a man changes a nickel, every time one spends a dime, would raise a large amount of money.

I do not believe, however, that we have reached such straits to find means to defray the expenses of this war that it is at all necessary to disrupt business in the way and to the extent that would be done by imposing a tax of this kind. I shall be surprised if there are many Members in the House outside of the gentleman from Massachusetts who will support the amendment he offers at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

13. Playing cards: Upon every pack of playing cards containing not more than 54 cards, manufactured or imported, and sold, or removed for consumption or sale, a tax of 8 cents per pack.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman what the committee means by "playing cards."

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] was on the subcommittee that dealt with that particular part of the bill, and he can make a more intelligent reply than I can.

Mr. CANNON. Still, I would be glad to know. My recollection is that when a child they had a game they called authors, which was played with cards. Would this cover those cards?

Mr. GARNER. This is a 52 deck.

Mr. KITCHIN. Not to exceed 54. [Laughter.] I do not think the gentleman from Texas ought to try to impose upon the House or the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. I fancy from the prompt way in which the gentleman speaks that he is an expert. Fifty-two—does that mean one or two jokers?

Mr. GARNER. One.

Mr. CANNON. Is there more than one joker?

Mr. GARNER. That depends on how you play the deuces. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will say, after listening to what the gentleman from North Carolina has said, that if the poet laureate of Great Britain should ask me how to write poetry, or Paderewski how to play the piano, or the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] should ask me to interpret the theory of Karl Marx, I should feel about as helpless as I do now in attempting to discuss playing cards in the presence of the gentleman from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, if I have a little time left, I would like to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina, the gentleman from Massachusetts, and the gentleman from Nebraska be allowed to sing that good old song, "It sounds to me, it sounds to me." [Laughter.]

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield? When this matter was explained by the senior members of the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], they passed it over to the younger members and explained that it had some reference to the Book of Kings.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I merely ask these questions for information. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina how it is that they have only raised this tax 1 cent where some other taxes have been jumped from $25 to $1,000; the tobacco tax has been doubled.

Mr. KITCHIN. The card schedule was being considered by a subcommittee while I was on another committee considering the excess-profit tax. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] was chairman of the committee and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] was a member of the committee. I do not know whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania was a member or not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was not on that subcommittee.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. There used to be a man in Washington, I am not sure whether he is here now or not, who called himself the Christian statesman and lobbyist. Did he appear before the committee touching the card schedule?

Mr. WALSH. I have read the hearings, but I did not see anything of the kind.

Mr. CANNON. Then he was asleep at the switch. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have made a more or less careful study of the production of playing cards.

Mr. KITCHIN. I knew there was a difference between playing cards and production.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; the gentleman from North Carolina knows how to play them, while I know only how they are produced. The reason the committee did not go further was that we have about reached the top of the revenue-producing power of playing cards. I am armed with figures, anticipating that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], or some other distinguished authority, would rise in his place when we reached this paragraph and make some inquiry or offer some suggestion, but it would delay the committee too long, I think, to go into details, except to say this, that having raised the tax on playing cards from 2 to 7 cents last year, we were much disappointed in the amount of revenue produced. It would seem that having raised the tax 350 per cent there would be something like a relative increase in the revenue derived, whereas, as a matter of fact, the increased revenue produced by the extra 5-cent tax amounted to less than one-third. It became evident from that that the production must have very greatly fallen off, and so we made some investigation, resulting as follows: In the year 1916 we derived a revenue of $819,654 from the tax on playing cards under a rate of 2 cents. In 1917, under a rate of 2 cents, we derived a revenue of $825,897. In 1918, under a tax of 7 cents, we derived $1,150,000.

I find that the production of playing cards in 1916 was 40,982,000 packs; in 1917, 41,040,000; and in 1918 it has fallen off to 28,360,000. I have the figures of the United States Playing Card Co., which produces in value more than two-thirds of all the playing cards in the country. I am perfectly frank to say that that is an industry in my district, though I hope that no one believes that influences my judgment. I have the figures of production month by month, and I shall read a few of them to show what the effect of this raising of the tax from 2 to 7 cents has been. The production on October 4, 1916, a year before this tax went into effect, was two million nineteen thousand and odd packs.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is under the 2-cent tax?

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is under the 2-cent tax. A year later, October 4, 1917, under the 7-cent tax, it was 1,132,000 packs, a falling off of over 50 per cent. In November, 1916, under the 2-cent tax, the total production was 2,685,024 packs, and in November, 1917, it was 807,696 packs, and so on in about the same relative proportion. The total of last year's production was 21,745,296 packs and the total of this year's production 10,622,304 packs, or a falling off of 52 per cent. It is perfectly evident that we have arrived at the top revenue-producing point, and I really doubt whether this increase of 1 cent will raise any more revenue. It is entirely apparent then that a substantial increase in tax would simply fail in its object, and that the revenue would be less than it is now.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, members of the committee have heard the expert on the production end of the committee, and I very much regret to say that I can not speak on behalf of the committee for its playing experts. They do not seem to be present here this afternoon during the discussion of this matter.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE XII—ADVISORY TAX BOARD.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to discuss this matter for a minute or two in respect to the parcel post.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think we better rise at this point.

Mr. STEENERSON. Very well, I shall discuss that question in the morning. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, at the request of some of the gentlemen on the other side, to put into the RECORD without reading my amendment with reference to the taxation of the products of child labor.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendment is as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GREEN of Iowa: Page 129, after line 22, insert a new subdivision, as follows:

"(27) Articles or commodities, the product of any mine, quarry, mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment within the United States in which children under the age of 14 years have been employed or permitted to work, or children between the ages of 14 and 16 have been employed or permitted to work more than eight hours in any day, or more than six days in any week, or after the hour of 6 o'clock post meridian during any portion of the taxable year, 5 per cent."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12863 and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LONDON for two days.

THE AMBASSADOR TO GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I notice by the evening paper that the Hon. John Davis has been appointed ambassador to Great Britain. He was formerly a member of this House, and those of us who had the pleasure of serving with him will recall him as a most capable, courteous, modest, and popular Member. I must admit that I have not esteemed highly many of the appointments made by this administration, and when this vacancy in England came about there occurred to my mind several great Republicans who I thought would fill it admirably, and I indulged a faint hope that one of them might be appointed as the first visible corroboration of the statement that "politics is adjourned." However, if that was not to be, I wish to say that I can think of no appointment that would have given more satisfaction to both sides of the House than this appointment of Mr. Davis. We all admire him and trust him as a man of sound judgment, of broad culture and learning, of high character, and of most charming personality, and I am sure that while he is at the Court of St. James that very lofty standard which has been fixed there by a long line of great Americans will not be lowered and that the exacting demands of this momentous crisis will be adequately met.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I believe every Member of the House who served with Mr. Davis can join heartily with the gentleman from Massachusetts in praise of his eminent ability, high character, and courteous deportment.

AMENDMENTS TO FEDERAL-RESERVE ACT.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 11283) and ask unanimous consent to waive the requirement of printing and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia presents a conference report and asks for its present consideration, the rule to the contrary notwithstanding. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask what the report is?

Mr. GLASS. Meanwhile I will say, Mr. Speaker, it is a bill making certain minor amendments to the Federal reserve act, unanimously reported to the House by the Banking and Currency Committee and unanimously adopted by the House and amended in numerous particulars by the Senate. The Senate has receded from every one of its amendments, and it is virtually the House bill, and the Senate has accepted the conference report.

Mr. GILLETT. I congratulate the gentleman and his fellow conferees.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the particular haste why the House bill should not be printed in the RECORD, so that other Members might see what the report is?

Mr. GLASS. The report simply is that the Senate recedes from all of its amendments and accepts it.

Mr. STAFFORD. It virtually is the Senate adopting the House bill and the gentleman now asks unanimous consent to have the House bill adopted.

Mr. GLASS. That this House unanimously passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the report.

The conference report is as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 793).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11283) to amend and reenact sections 4, 11, 16, 19, and 22 of the act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act, and sections 5208 and 5209, Revised Statutes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment to the title.

CARTER GLASS,
MICHAEL F. PHELAN,
E. A. HAYES,
Managers on the part of the House.
ROBT. L. OWEN,
ATLEE POMERENE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, September 19, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. PADGETT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12945) providing for the purchase of uniforms, accouterments, and equipment by officers of the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, and midshipmen at the Naval Academy from the Government at cost, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 787), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12934) to extend certain provisions of the war-risk insurance act of September 2, 1914, as amended, to cadets at the United States Military Academy and midshipmen at the United States Naval Academy, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 786), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12916) to provide for the temporary promotion of commissioned officers of the Marine Corps serving with the Army, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 788), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12915) to provide additional pay for warrant officers on shore duty beyond the continental limits of the United States, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 789), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12194) to provide for the award of medals of honor, distinguished-service medals, and Navy crosses, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 790), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10849) to establish certain new ratings in the United States Navy, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 791), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10747) providing for the better administration of justice in the Navy, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 792), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. HARRISON of Virginia, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12793) for the relief of Nathan Manzer, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 784), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7859) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Joseph P. Brady, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 785), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII,

Mr. GANDY introduced a bill (H. R. 12961) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the city of Rapid City, S. Dak., one condemned bronze or brass cannon or fieldpiece and suitable outfit of cannon balls, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ANTHONY: A bill (H. R. 12962) granting an increase of pension to Hiram F. Stover; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WALSH: A bill (H. R. 12963) granting an increase of pension to Albert Damon; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WELTY: A bill (H. R. 12964) granting a pension to Frank Chronabery; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin: Resolutions adopted by the Racine (Wis.) Trades and Labor Council on September 2, 1918 (Labor Day), reassuring the brothers and comrades of its members who are now on the firing line in Europe; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ELSTON: Petition of residents of Alameda, Cal., on behalf of the Edmonds bill, House bill 5531; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: Petition of Claucy's drug store (Inc.) of La Salle, Ill., protesting against the proposed tax on nonbeverage alcohol; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of Curt Teich & Co., of Chicago, protesting against the 2-cent rate on post cards; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, memorial of the National Fraternal Congress of America, favoring the speedy enactment of Senate bill 3475; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GALLIVAN: Petition of Blodgett Ordway & Webber, Farley Harvey & Co., John Ainsley & Co., Jacob Dreyfus & Son, Simons, Hatch & Whitten Co., Hawley Folsom Co., Walker Stetson Co., and Brown-Wales Co., urging the legal retention of part of the paper profits as a protection against the return to normal conditions; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of L. H. Daloz Co., relative to the proposed tax on gasoline; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HUTCHINSON: Petition of Mr. D. Hart Cunningham and citizens and relatives of men in the military service of the Nation from Hightstown, N. J., urging the speedy passage of House bill 5531, providing for a Pharmaceutical Corps for the United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. OSBORNE: Petition of Arthur E. Maas and a number of other citizens of Los Angeles, Cal., in favor of the Edmonds bill (H. R. 5531) to provide a Pharmaceutical Corps for the United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of Albert Killian and a number of other citizens of San Pedro, and of E. A. Talbott and 204 other citizens of Los Angeles, Ca., in favor of the Edmonds bill to provide a Pharmaceutical Corps for the United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. Raker: Petition of Langley & Michaels Co., wholesale druggists, San Francisco, Cal., protesting against proposed tax on nonbeverage alcohol; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of Benjamin C. Marsh, Bliss Building, Washington, D. C., in re income tax; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, September 19, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we stand in Thy presence as we face every responsibility and duty of life. So fully are we in Thy hands that Thou dost order. We can not change the divine plan. We prepare, we execute, and, lo, Thy grace prevents us. We submit ourselves into Thy hands. Thy blessings are more than we can ask or think. We pray Thee to prepare us for the duties that are upon us, giving to us an ever-increasing vision of the possibilities that lie before us in answer to our consecration of our lives and the service and leadership of God. Grant us grace this day to do Thy will. For Christ's sake. Amen.

On request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

SUPPLY OF MINERAL OILS (S. DOC. NO. 280).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Director of the Bureau of Mines, which will lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD.

The communication is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
BUREAU OF MINES,
Washington, September 17, 1918.

SIR: In connection with resolution passed by the Senate asking whether the enactment of S. 2812 would help the oil situation, the following is submitted:

Prior to September 27, 1909, public lands in the United States and the Territory of Alaska were subject to exploration, location, and purchase under the placer mining laws of the United States (sec. 2329–2331, R. S., acts of Feb. 11, 1897, 29 Stat., 526, and Feb. 12, 1903, 32 Stat., 825). Under these laws any citizen of the United States or person who had declared his intention to become such, could go upon the public lands and explore for oil, and upon discovery apply for and receive patent as prescribed in the mining laws. September 27, 1909, the President of the United States withdrew from exploration, location, and entry large areas of public lands known or believed to contain valuable deposits of petroleum for the primary purpose of withholding same until Congress could consider legislation designed to secure the exploration for and development of deposits of oil and gas under a leasing law. Similar withdrawals had been made from time to time until at the present there are withdrawn from all exploration, location, and entry 6,524,834 acres of land either known to contain oil and gas or believed to possess possibilities thereof. This acreage is not all public lands, as considerable areas within the exterior limits of withdrawals were patented under the various public-land laws prior to dates of withdrawal. There are also withdrawn 132,024 acres of land known to contain valuable deposits of oil shale. The withdrawals cover lands in the States of Arizona, California, Colorado, Louisiana, Montana, North Dakota, Utah, and Wyoming. In addition all lands containing deposits of oil in the Territory of Alaska are likewise withdrawn.

Most of the lands so withdrawn are free from claims and would, if S. 2812 or other legislation providing for their disposition were enacted into law, be subject to exploration and development in accordance with its provisions. A minor portion of the area, comprising valuable proven oil territory was, however, covered by locations made under the mining law prior to withdrawal and the claims so asserted have not been disposed of but are pending in the Land Department or in the courts. Most of these claims have upon them one or more producing oil wells, but increased production through the drilling of additional wells is practically halted by the withdrawal. The so-called relief provisions of S. 2812 are designed to adjust these controversies and secure the development of the lands.

In my opinion the enactment of a law providing for the development of the oil lands of the United States would (1) open to exploration and development the vast areas of public land in the United States and Alaska now absolutely withdrawn from exploration and development, thereby resulting in the discovery and development of new oil fields and deposits, thus adding to the oil and gas supply of the United States and Alaska; (2) permit of the leasing of lands now withdrawn and actually proven to contain valuable deposits of oil and gas by the existing wells upon the lands or upon adjoining tracts; these fields are principally located in California, Wyoming, Montana, and Louisiana; and (3) permit of the further development of existing claims within withdrawn areas which have upon them one or more producing oil wells. These areas are already equipped with pipe lines and facilities for developing and transporting oil, and many of the interested individuals and corporatons have equipment in the way of casing and other supplies which could be immediately utilized in the drilling of additional wells.

The most immediate results would be obtained from the lands mentioned in the above items 2 and 3, namely, proven lands which have not been developed by oil wells and lands within withdrawals but which have within their limits one or more producing oil wells at the present time.

During the past few years I have made a number of reports and suggestions to the Public Land Committees of Congress with respect to legislation of the character involved, and bills have passed one of the bodies of Congress, but none has received concurrent approval. I do not feel that I should at this time specifically indorse any particular measure, and consequently this report is designed to explain briefly why I believe the enactment of legislation for the development of the oil resources of the public domain would materially aid in obtaining an increased fuel supply in the immediate future. It must be obvious to anyone familiar with the situation that the existing withdrawals and controversies prevent the bringing of the oil from underground and into use, and the conditions described in the report of the United States Fuel Administrator in his report to the Senate dated September 10, 1918, document 277, and in my report responding to Senate resolution 301 which gave in some detail the present situation with special reference to gasoline, emphasize the importance and desirability of the enactment of legislation which will, while properly preserving the public interest, stimulate and encourage the production of oil from our public lands.

I am of the opinion, therefore, that viewed from any angle the passage of a leasing bill is desirable, and conditions possibly will arise that will make it distinctly a war measure.

Respectfully,

VAN. H. MANNING, Director.

The PRESIDENT UNITED STATES SENATE.

MEMORIALS.

Mr. NELSON presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from the city comptroller of Minneapolis, from the mayor of Minneapolis, and from Thomas Tomasek, of Albany, all in the State of Minnesota, remonstrating against the proposed taxes on municipal bonds, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred, as follows:

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 4947) to provide for a survey and classification by the Secretary of the Interior of all unentered public lands of the United States and all unused cut-over, logged, and swamp lands and other unused lands of the United States, with a view to disposing thereof to honorably discharged soldiers and sailors and others, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. WALSH:

A bill (S. 4948) granting an increase of pension to Ella E. Smith (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 4949) for the relief of J. C. Garrett; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THE REVENUE.

Mr. GORE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

ACTIVITIES OF BREWERS' ASSOCIATION.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I submit a Senate resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 307) was read, as follows:

Whereas Hon. A. Mitchell Palmer, Custodian of Alien Property, on or about September 14, made the following statement:

"The facts will soon appear which will conclusively show that 12 or 15 German brewers of America, in association with the United Brewers' Association, furnished the money, amounting to several hundred thousand dollars, to buy a great newspaper in one of the chief cities of the Nation; and its publisher, without disclosing whose money had bought that organ of public opinion, in the very Capital of the Nation, in the shadow of the Capitol itself, has been fighting the battle of liquor traffic.

"When the traffic, doomed though it is, undertakes and seeks by these secret methods to control party nominations, party machinery, whole political parties, and thereby control the government of State and Nation, it is time the people know the truth.

"The organized liquor traffic of the country is a vicious interest because it has been unpatriotic, because it has been pro-German in its sympathies and its conduct. Around these great brewery organizations owned by rich men, almost all of them of German birth and sympathy, at least before we entered the war, has grown up the societies, all the organizations of this country intended to keep young German immigrants from becoming real American citizens.

"It is around the sangerfests and sangerbunds and organizations of that kind, generally financed by the rich brewers, that the young Germans who come to America are taught to remember first, the fatherland, and, second, America," and

Whereas it has been publicly and repeatedly charged against the United States Brewers' Association and allied brewing companies and interests that there is in the Department of Justice and in the office of a certain United States district attorney evidence showing—

That the said United States Brewers' Association, brewing companies, and allied interests have in recent years made contributions to political campaigns on a scale without precedent in the political history of the country and in violation of the laws of the land;

That, in order to control legislation in State and Nation, they have exacted pledges from candidates to office, including Congressmen and United States Senators, before election, such pledges being on file;

That, in order to influence public opinion to their ends, they have heavily subsidized the public press and stipulated when contracting for advertising space with the newspapers that a certain amount be editorial space, the literary material for the space being provided from the brewers' central office in New York;

That, in order to suppress expressions of opinion hostile to their trade and political interests, they have set in operation an extensive system of boycotting of American manufacturers, merchants, railroads, and other interests;

That, for the furthering of their political enterprises, they have erected a political organization to carry out their purposes;

That they were allied to powerful suborganizations, among them the German-American Alliance whose charter was revoked by the unanimous vote of Congress; the National Association of Commerce and Labor, and the manufacturers' and dealers' associations; and that they have their ramifications in other organizations apparently neutral in character;

That they have on file political surveys of States, counties, and districts tabulating the men and forces for and against them and that they have paid large sums of money to citizens of the United States to advocate their cause and interests, including some in the Government employ;

That they have defrauded the Federal Government by applying to their political corruption funds money which should have gone to the Federal Treasury in taxes;

That they are attempting to build up in the country through the control of such organizations as the United States Societies and by the manipulation of the foreign-language press a political influence which can be turned to one or the other party, thus controlling electoral results;

That they, or some of their organizations, have pleaded nolo contendere to charges filed against them and have paid fines aggregating large sums of money: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized and directed to call upon the Hon. A. Mitchell Palmer, Alien Property Custodian, and the Department of Justice and its United States district attorneys to produce the evidence and documents relating to the charges herein mentioned, and to subpœna any witnesses or documents relating thereto that it may find necessary, and to make a report of the result of such investigation and what is shown thereby to the Senate of the United States as promptly as possible.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. FLETCHER. I was engaged with another matter and I did not hear the whole of the resolution read. It seems to me that a resolution of such importance ought to go to a committee and let the committee consider it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the Senator will permit me, it recites various charges and facts that I think all Senators are acquainted with, and directs the Judiciary Committee or a subcommittee thereof to call upon Mr. Palmer and the Department of Justice for the facts and documents in their possession tending to sustain the charges. I take it that it will simply involve an investigation of documentary evidence, because I understand from information outside that whatever proof there is is of a documentary character. I have not even put in a provision which would involve any expense, because I understand Mr. Palmer can furnish the documents, and I think he can furnish them very promptly. These documents are available. So I do not think it will be a very complicated affair at all.

Mr. FLETCHER. The resolution does not provide for the appointment of a special committee?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; the Judiciary Committee will make the investigation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

"TWO THOUSAND QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, day before yesterday, in speaking about the book, Two Thousand Questions and Answers, I stated on the faith of Mr. Creel's letter that it had been withdrawn by the publishers, the Doran Co., as I understood that to be the case. This morning I have received from more than one person advertisements of the work which they received yesterday by mail. I only want to call attention to the fact that on the outside of the envelope which carries these advertisements in large black type are the words, "Did Germany warn passengers on the Lusitania?" which is answered in the book in the affirmative. There is an advertisement also lauding Mr. Creel's letter, which he has retracted and apologized for and withdrawn, and it is being circulated as an advertisement of the book. Something ought to be done to stop that book from general circulation.

WATER-POWER DEVELOPMENT.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to Senate bill 1419.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1419) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a substitute.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum. This matter ought to be considered with a quorum present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Hale	New	Smoot
Brandegee	Harding	Overman	Sterling
Calder	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Thomas
Chamberlain	Kendrick	Poindexter	Trammell
Culberson	McKellar	Shafroth	Warren
Cummins	McNary	Sheppard	Wilfley
Curtis	Martin, Ky.	Shields	Williams
Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.
Frelinghuysen	Myers	Smith, Md.
Guion	Nelson	Smith, S. C.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. ASHURST, Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. KELLOGG, Mr. KING, Mr. KIRBY, Mr. REED, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr.

UNDERWOOD, Mr. VARDAMAN, and Mr. WALSH answered to their names when called.

Mr. KNOX, Mr. FRANCE, Mr. HENDERSON, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. DREW, Mr. PITTMAN, and Mr. FALL entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT Fifty-five Senators have answered. There is a quorum present.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House and ask for a conference, and that the Vice President name the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I hope the motion just made by the Senator from Florida will not prevail. The bill that has been sent to the Senate by the House is an entirely new bill. It has no resemblance to the bill which passed the Senate, except that it refers in part, and in part only, to the same subject.

This bill, which has been passed by the other House, includes not only provision for the construction of dams and other structures of that character in navigable streams, but it also includes the use of the public lands and waters—if there are any public waters—in the public domain; in other words, it embraces not only what is known here as the Shields bill—that is, the subject of the Shields bill—but it also embraces the subject of the Myers bill.

The conference committee would have no guide whatever in its action upon the matter. The Senate has never passed upon the most important, the most vital, propositions contained in the action of the other House. I am not willing that a bill of so great importance, involving the future development, in so far as water powers are concerned, in the United States for a period of 50 years or longer, shall be made in conference. I want, if it is possible to secure it, an opportunity upon the part of the Senate to deal with some of the questions that have been proposed in the bill passed by the other House. I intend to move the reference of the bill to a committee for consideration.

The bill for which this is a substitute came from the Committee on Commerce; but I can very well see that, by reason of the addition of the subject of public lands and the public domain, it ought to be considered here now by a special committee, composed of members of the Committee on Commerce and of the Committee on Public Lands. It was considered in the other House—and I think under the direct suggestion of the administration—by a special committee composed of members of the Committees on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, of Public Lands, of Agriculture, and, possibly, one other committee. That committee was made up with great care, and it proceeded to hold extensive hearings upon the subject, the result of which is an entirely new bill.

This bill is unlike the one we passed in the Senate in every substantial particular. It would be utterly impossible to define the controversy between the House of Representatives and the Senate if we sent this bill now to conference. It could not be done. All that could be done would be for the conference committee to take the House bill and agree to such parts of it as might commend themselves to its judgment.

I hope the Senate will not completely abdicate its functions and dismiss to a conference committee the consideration of one of the most important matters which ever came before the Senate. This is not a war measure; there is no necessity for instantaneous action; there is nothing contemplated under the bill for a period of three years or more. We have time now to consider it; more time than we shall ever have in the near future, and it is our duty to do it.

Mark you, this bill begins by the creation of a commission composed of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture, with all of the paraphernalia—if I may use that term—that goes with a commission. The Senate bill proposed no such thing. This bill entirely eliminates the protection which the Senate cast around the little streams of the country; those streams which are not navigable other than theoretically; those streams which will require canalization or extensive improvement in order to even float a skiff. All these are brought within the jurisdiction of this commission in the bill which has passed the other House.

Moreover, the bill as it comes to us confers upon the commission, without a guide, without a rule, without a suggestion, without any requirement of uniformity, the unrestricted power to make such an annual charge for the alleged permit or privilege granted by the Government as may please the commission. It is a most extraordinary provision to be found in any bill. I do not know of any legislation ever adopted by Congress which gives such unbridled, unlimited, and unregulated power to an administrative body as is proposed in this bill.

Furthermore, there is a plain intimation that there are some streams, some waters, which ought not to be left to the jurisdiction of the commission. There is one exception in the proposed bill, which is generally supposed to refer to the Hetch-Hetchy development or improvement in California. I am of the opinion that all boundary waters, and especially the waters of the Niagara River or the waters which connect Lake Erie with Lake Ontario, should, in any event, be withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the commission. There is a situation which involves not only our relation to Canada but which involves other economic and industrial problems, with which Congress must deal directly and not through the unregulated and uncontrolled act of a commission.

I mention these things only to indicate how important it is that we take up this bill in some form or other and express our opinion about it; that is, the bill that has been passed by the other House. We have never given a moment's consideration to the most important things that are contained in the House bill. They have never been before the Senate, and if we send this bill to conference we will never have an opportunity to amend it in any respect. If there ever comes a report of agreement from the conference committee, then we will be compelled either to reject that report as a whole or adopt it as a whole. Is it possible that we have reached a point in our deliberations when we are willing to forego the opportunity and to abdicate the duty of expressing our views with regard to a subject so important and so far-reaching as the one involved in this bill? I think not. I do not see why it is proposed to deal with it in this summary way; I can see no justification for it.

So far as I am personally concerned, I have a view with regard to the jurisdiction and the interest of the United States in so-called navigable streams; others have views with regard to the interest of the United States in the waters which flow through our public lands. I will not speak of the latter, but of the former, so far as I am concerned, I want an opportunity for the Senate to review its position in that regard. I am one of those who believe that all that the United States can do or ought to do with regard to our navigable streams is to determine whether a proposed structure is an obstruction to navigation. I am willing that it shall determine that and abide by that determination for 50 years, if you please, so that capital may be attracted to the investment that may be proposed; but I am not willing by either my silence or my vote to have it understood that the United States has an interest in navigable streams which it may sell for profit. It has no such interest. We are limited to such regulations as we may think best in order to promote navigation, in order to stimulate commerce among the States.

If I had been in the least avaricious of power, I would have suggested that this bill ought to go also to the Interstate Commerce Committee, for it has more things in it which are covered by the jurisdiction of that committee than are covered by the jurisdiction of any other one committee; but I do not insist upon that. My friend from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is so modest in the assertion of his prerogatives that I think he is willing that it may go to the other committees, being sure that it will be dealt with there from an enlightened and comprehensive standpoint.

Mr. President, I move that this bill, the substitute proposed by the House, be referred to a special committee, to be composed of five members of the Committee on Commerce and five members of the Committee on Public Lands, these members to be selected by the chairmen of the respective committees.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I make the point of order that a motion is pending and that the motion of the Senator from Iowa, therefore, is not in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair might as well rule now as at any time.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I be heard on the point of order before it is ruled upon?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I make a parliamentary inquiry? Suppose this motion is in order, is it then a debatable motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending motion is debatable. The Chair has read what is said in Jefferson's Manual, although there is nothing of Jefferson left in this body; and the Chair does not have any doubt at all that the motion to refer to a committee of conference is first in order and is debatable. If it is overruled, a motion can be made to refer it to a special committee or to a standing committee, and if neither of these motions carries, the Chair has not any doubt of the right of the Senate to discuss the bill and amend it. That is the opinion of the Chair, and he has been considering the subject.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that the opinion of the Chair is a correct opinion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Of course, the order of procedure now, there being a pending motion to refer it to conference, requires that that motion must first be disposed of.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand, the motion is debatable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to ask the Chair whether it would be in order to amend the motion to disagree to the House amendment and refer the bill to a conference committee by a motion that it be referred to a special committee instead of a conference committee?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks not. The Chair has just ruled on that point.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not hear the Chair's ruling, I will say to the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question of referring it to a conference committee is debatable. The Senate can get all the light and information that Senators choose to give it upon that question, and it can then either adopt or reject the motion. Then it is subject to a motion to refer to a standing committee or to a special committee, and the Senate can discuss those questions. If not referred, the Chair is then of the opinion that the bill is in the Senate and open to amendment. That is the opinion of the Chair, and it will stand unless appealed from.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wonder why, if the Chair has it in mind, a motion to refer a matter to a conference committee is not amendable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reason, in the mind of the Chair, is this, that always that motion is in order which is calculated to bring the Houses most speedily to an agreement. While problematical, it appears to the Chair that reference to a conference committee is a procedure that is calculated to bring the House and the Senate more speedily than in any other way to an agreement, and therefore such a motion is not amendable.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not have a sufficiently strong opinion about it myself to say that I differ with the Chair; but it would seem to me that the question as to which committee would result in the greater probability of promoting legislation would depend upon the membership of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate decides that question when it votes. There is a distinct rule upon the question, that a motion to refer to one committee is not amendable by a motion to refer to another.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Chair will pardon me, I assume that this is not simply a matter of reference to a committee. The motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] was, as I understood it, that the Senate disagree to the House amendment and ask for a committee of conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And that the conferees be appointed by the Chair.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And that the Chair appoint the conferees, which is not the ordinary motion to refer to a committee, but is a motion of disagreement coupled with a motion to request the House to appoint conferees to act with certain conferees to be appointed by the Senate and to report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senate does not want that done it can vote down the motion very readily.

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator wish to address himself to this subject?

Mr. FLETCHER. Only very briefly. The Senator from Idaho, perhaps, wants to discuss the matter at some length. I was just going to state what is the proposition before us, and why I have made this motion, very briefly, so as to leave the matter open for discussion. I do not wish to enter into any long discussion.

Mr. BORAH. I do not wish to interfere with the program of the Senator from Florida, who has charge of this matter, as I understand; but I want an opportunity to address myself generally to the subject matter as soon as the Senator has made his point with reference to the mode of procedure.

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly. I have submitted the point which the Chair has ruled upon, that this first motion is in order, that it is not amendable, and that if the Senate does not agree to the motion then other motions will be in order, and finally the bill may come to a position where it is amendable on the floor; but I believe that this motion is the quickest way to reach definite results regarding this legislation. It is in that spirit and in that faith that I make the motion, and it is upon the principle that the motion, as the Chair holds, is first in order, as being calculated to bring the two Houses together on an important piece of legislation.

Of course, it is true that this identical bill as it comes from the House has not been before the Senate. That is the case with almost every amendment made in either body. The bill is the Senate bill S. 1419, which was originally referred to the Commerce Committee, was reported out by that committee, and passed by the Senate. It goes to the House, and there all after the enacting clause is stricken out, and a new bill is passed by the House as an amendment to the Senate bill. This new bill includes in substance very largely the Senate bill as it originally passed, S. 1419, with some modifications, and also the substance, with some modifications, of a bill which was reported by the Public Lands Committee of the Senate, known as the Myers bill, but which never passed the Senate. It was debated here for several days, as Senators will recall, but it did not finally pass. The substitute now before the Senate includes both what was known as the Shields bill, S. 1419, and the Myers bill, which, as I say, was reported by the Public Lands Committee and debated for some time in the Senate, but was never either passed or defeated. A vote never was reached on it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to say that the statement now made by the Senator constitutes, in my judgment, one of the strong arguments against sending this bill to conference. The House has seen fit to strike out the Senate bill entirely and to substitute for it its own bill with regard to navigable waters and the so-called Myers bill with regard to unnavigable waters on the public domain, which the Senate never passed, and which it ought to consider, and consider very fully, before permitting a measure so framed to go to conference.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was trying to state the case as fairly as I can, Mr. President, and I was saying that whereas the Myers bill did not actually pass the Senate, as I recall, it was debated for some days in the Senate and very thoroughly considered; so that it is not a new proposition here at all.

There are very few points of difference between the Senate and the House, as I understand, in respect to this great piece of legislation. It is a most important measure. It affects to a vast degree—beyond our calculation now, it seems to me—great industrial interests and great natural resources of the country. It makes available for the public benefit and the public good these great resources which have been lying idle and unused for centuries past, and it is, of course, important that as soon as possible we should accomplish definite and certains means of promoting this development and bringing into use and service and benefit these great resources.

I hope that we can conclude this great subject and conclude it speedily, but I doubt exceedingly if reference to a special committee will get us very far. Differences will arise in the committee. Conclusions will be finally reached by the committee which will have to be thrashed out in the Senate. Final results may be reached here which never can be concurred in by the other body, and the consequence is that delay, procrastination, hindrances, obstructions, and what not will be interposed, until we may find ourselves hopelessly involved in confusion and doubt and uncertainty, with nothing done. I do not think this matter ought to proceed in that direction and along that course.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it is important that we should accomplish results. I am perfectly willing that the conferees originally named on the Shields bill, coming from the Commerce Committee, shall be supplemented by, say, two members of the Public Lands Committee so that the conferees on the part of the Senate may be five in number—three from the Commerce Committee and two from the Public Lands Committee. With those five members on the part of the Senate, and with a like number on the part of the House, I am quite sure this bill can be put into sound and safe condition, and legislation which will be agreeable to both bodies will result from the conference. I believe that beyond any question within a reasonable time the conference committee can get together on the provisions of a bill which will meet with the approval of the Members of the Senate and the Members of the House.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The new rule that we have adopted, that no new matter may be incorporated in a conference report, precludes the possibility of any legislation being brought in here that is entirely new to that which was contained in the Senate bill and in what the House has substituted. Now, I want to ask the Senator this question: Is the objection to the bill going to conference based upon the fact that entirely new matter is desired rather than a contention for what the Senate has already passed being maintained as against what the House has passed?

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, the argument, as presented by the Senator from Iowa, is that we have a perfectly new bill here, and that that bill has not been thoroughly considered by the Senate, and therefore he thinks it should go to a special committee, to be reported on by the special committee, and debated in the Senate. In answer to the Senator from South Carolina, I will say that the rule to which he refers, recently adopted by the Senate, really does not interfere with this matter in either way. It does not prevent a full and free conference on the whole bill. It does not interfere with changing any portion of this bill by the conferees, because all of the bill now will be in conference, not merely portions of it, that were passed in the Senate and accepted in the House; not merely those portions wherein the House disagrees with the Senate on the Senate bill; but the whole thing is in conference, because they come here with a measure which strikes out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill and inserts entirely new matter.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But that leaves the Senate bill still in conference.

Mr. FLETCHER. It leaves the whole thing in conference.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. We all understand that that leaves the Senate bill as passed by the Senate still in conference, because this substitute bill of the House is in the form of an amendment, necessarily, for it contains the title of the Senate bill. Now, that being true, in conference you can adopt any matter that was contained in either bill or you can adopt the entire matter contained in either, but you can not bring in any new matter.

I have not kept up with the bill sufficiently to be informed as to this matter: Do those who object to the bill going to conference object on the ground that there ought to be absolutely new matter included that has not been included either in the House originally or in the Senate originally?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, as one who objects to the bill going to conference, I think there not only will be, but there necessarily will be new matter. This bill really is in about the same position as though, when we had passed the Shields bill and sent it over to the House, the House had stricken out everything after the enacting clause and substituted for the bill the recent draft law. What would be in conference then? What would be in controversy in the conference? How would the two Houses get together?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Why, the original Senate bill and the House bill—the two would be in conference. The House struck out all after the enacting clause and substituted its bill for the one that we passed. Therefore, when you go to conference both bills will be in conference. Of course, they will be in conference.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to the fact that the illustration given by the Senator from Iowa is wholly inapt. The House bill and the Senate bill relate to the same subject matter—the development of water power in the streams of the United States—and both of them attempt to cover the entire subject, though they take contrary views about it, which the conference is intended to compromise and reconcile. Everything in relation to the development of water power, however, is involved in one or the other bill and will, therefore, be involved in the conference.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Precisely.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? I should like to ask the Senator from Florida, and also the Senator from South Carolina, if this bill should go to conference, and the committee should come to the conclusion that instead of a leasing bill we should have a system of public ownership and control, could you insert that in lieu of what you have?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. You can vote it down.

Mr. BORAH. I am not talking about voting it down. I do not want it voted down. I want it voted up. Could you insert it in the bill under the rule which prohibits the insertion of new matter by the conferees?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Not unless it was included in the House substitute. If it is in the House substitute, you can report it.

Mr. BORAH. It is not in the House substitute.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Very well; then it can not get in the bill, unless you draft a new bill. My point is this: Here is a subject matter that has been passed upon by the two Houses. Now, you have not lost control of the Senate bill. You now have jurisdiction over both the Senate bill and the House bill in conference. Unless you want a new bill, which you can introduce, the subject matter that has been passed upon by both Houses is still in conference.

Mr. BORAH. Another question: If we keep the bill here in the Senate, and we conclude to construct a bill upon the basis of public ownership, we can amend it so as to do that here in the Senate, can we not?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. You can not in conference.

Mr. BORAH. But we can if we keep it here in the Senate, can we not?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Oh, you can if you take it from the conferees; yes.

Mr. THOMAS. It is not in conference.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not in conference.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I say if you keep it in conference. That is the very point I am making. If you want to put in absolutely new matter in reference to both the House bill and the Senate bill, you have got to make some other disposition than to send it to conference. If you send it to conference, the conferees can only consider the subject matter contained in the original Senate bill and in the substitute of the House.

Mr. FLETCHER. The fact that the House substitutes the whole matter leaves that whole matter open to change by the conferees.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Florida a question.

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Suppose the Senate amends the proposition now before the Senate, which is the House substitute. Suppose the Senate should write into that substitute of the House an amendment that a majority of the Senate favor; then, of course, the bill can not go to conference.

Mr. FLETCHER. No.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It must go back to the House; and if it goes back to the House, and the House should concur in the amendment written in by the Senate, would not that pass the bill absolutely and take it out of the hands of both Houses?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it would. I think we can do those three things.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It seems to me that the most dangerous thing you can do is to amend the bill and send it back to the House, because that passes it, if they concur in the amendment, and leaves in the bill all the objectionable matter that the House has included, if there is objectionable matter. The Senate would have no opportunity at all, in conference or otherwise, to consider it, and compromise our differences.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I answer for a moment the Senator from Alabama? There is no danger in that——

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think there is.

Mr. CUMMINS. Because when the bill is open to amendment here, and is amended, it may be assumed and will have to be assumed that it passes from here back to the House in the form in which the Senate desires it; and if the House accepts the amendments which we attach to it, of course it becomes a law, and it ought to become a law, because we will have passed on every phase of the measure; and it will go from here to the House just as the Senate wants it to be.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa if, to carry out his view of the matter, the Senate would not now have to amend the substitute bill in every particular in which it disagrees with it, and thus, under the facts of this case, write a new bill such as the Senate has already passed, and send it back to the House, which would seem to be an absurd thing?

Mr. CUMMINS. So far as I am concerned, there are a good many things in the House bill that are better than some of the things in the Senate bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, while that may be true the Senate did not agree with him when it passed the bill in that form.

Mr. CUMMINS. All I ask is that the bill be put where we can deal with it and it can go back to the House, whether it goes to conference or not, and where it can be put by the Senate in the form in which we believe such legislation ought to be.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, referring to these inquiries, I will state generally that there are three things to be done in cases of this kind. The Senate passes a bill and it goes to the House, is acted upon, and messaged back here. The Senate can agree to the amendment of the House, in which case the bill passes both bodies and becomes a law. It can agree to the amendment of the House with an amendment, in which case it goes back to the other House, and if that House accepts that amendment the bill passes and becomes a law; it never goes into conference at all. On the other hand, the Senate can disagree to the House amendment and ask for a conference, and that is what we are doing now. Of course it is possible, if that motion is voted down, then to have the bill referred to a special committee, if the Senate so desires, and let it start anew, practically, the consideration of the bill through this special committee and then report to the Senate. If the motion is voted down, amendments can be offered on the floor; and if the amendments are agreed to in this body then the House amendment is accepted with certain amendments, which go back to that body and if they are agreed to by the House, the bill becomes a law.

I am aware that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] desires to enter upon a discussion of the measure in some detail. My view is that we will make quicker progress and better progress by having this bill go to conference now, and I am perfectly willing, as I said, although that might be a little irregular, to have members of the Committee on Public Lands added to members of the Committee on Commerce, where the bill originated, as managers on the part of the Senate, making five in all. When that is done the conferees will meet. Their report does not finally settle the matter. When the report comes back from the conference the bill is then open for full discussion as to whether the report of the conference shall be agreed to or not. If the report of the conferees is objectionable to the Senate, they can discuss that matter and vote down the report, if they so desire. If, on the other hand, the conferees report a measure which is satisfactory to the Senate, then the Senate so declares, and that ends it so far as this legislation is concerned and so far as this body is concerned. I think it is the speediest way, and I think it will work out to the satisfaction of the Senate if a conference is held as provided for in my motion. I am afraid, on the other hand, if it goes to a special committee there will be long delays, that there will be difficulties and embarrassments generally, which will perhaps ultimately endanger the passage of such a measure as the public interest requires.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this bill occupies a peculiar position from a parliamentary standpoint. No one except a very expert parliamentarian can define its position, and certainly no one except an expert parliamentarian can tell what the program will be with reference to disposing of it. So I am going to avail myself of this opportunity, for fear I shall have no other, of making some general observations upon the bill, in the hope that, whether we dispose of it here or whether we dispose of it in conference, certain provisions of the bill may be so changed or modified as to accelerate the policy of the public ownership of water power. I do not hope at this time to see a bill in all respects in conformity with that principle, but I am so certain that we must come to that policy that I am very anxious to see this bill so formed that no particular embarrassment will be thrown about its progress.

There is no domestic problem in which the country, and the great West particularly, is more interested than that of power development. It lies at the base of our future growth and permanent prosperity. It is not a problem of mere temporary moment or reaching over a few years, but it is one extending itself into the remotest future and is associated with our permanent happiness and prosperity. It is important, therefore, whatever we do, whether we get immediate results or delayed results, that we adopt a correct, a wise, and permanent policy. We are all anxious to see development, but we must not sacrifice entirely to the present. We should not adopt a method which will hasten development regardless of whether it is the best method or not. I want as speedy development as can be had with a due regard to the permanent interests of the communities and of the people generally. I hope, therefore, we will not permit ourselves to be controlled exclusively by the proposition of hasty action or hasty development, although that is an important factor.

Water power is monopolistic in its nature, and therefore lends itself to artificial monopoly. In determining upon a system or a policy of development this fact should not be forgotten. Even if there were no water-power monopoly at the present time there would inevitably come to be one from the very nature of the subject matter with which we deal. It is not necessary, therefore, for us to be diverted or unduly affected by the presence or absence of a power trust or a power monopoly at this time. It is sufficient that we know that in the very nature of things we are to have either a monopoly owned and controlled by the Government or public authority or owned and controlled by private interests tempered by supposed regulation. Some effective and drastic policy, therefore, of either public ownership or public control is undoubtedly elemental in the framing of any plan or scheme to deal with this subject matter. I am for public ownership and control. I have come to this conclusion after years of study rather slowly. But to my mind there is no alternative if we are going to dedicate this great natural beneficence to the people as a whole.

In 1912 the Commissioner of Corporations made a most thorough and illuminating report on water-power development in the United States. On page 204 of that report I find the following statement:

> The prime element of monopoly in a commercial power system lies in the distributing lines. Before a commercial power concern, whether using water or fuel, can operate on any extensive scale it must have access to the great body of power users. Such access can be had only through a distributing system requiring a large investment and involving the use of streets in cities and towns—and, in the case of a water-power concern, a right of way and additional investment for its transmission lines. The conditions under which the local distribution of power is effected are such that, as a matter of practical experience, effective competition is seldom encountered. It does not matter so much whether a franchise to construct a power-distributing system legally excludes competition or not. Experience has shown that in analogous cases, such as the duplicating of gas plants, etc., competition ordinarily is short lived, regardless of legal conditions. The maintenance of two or more power-distributing systems in the same community generally involves a waste of capital, commonly results in the absorption of the weaker concern by the stronger, and in actual practice the control of such distribution in a given locality is almost invariably found in the hands of a single concern. This is true without regard to the source of the power. A system for distributing power from a fuel power plant is not different in this respect from that for a water-power plant. An individual consumer of power rarely has access to the service of more than one power concern.
> In the case of water power, these monopolistic tendencies are increased because of factors peculiar to that industry.

On page 206 there is a further paragraph that it is worth while to know:

> The important fact for this report is that such a concentrated control of the power source and distributing system is peculiarly likely to take place in connection with water power. The factors of "coupling up," of unification of storage, of natural advantage of water-power sites, as already stated, all work strongly toward concentration in the water-power industry. Furthermore, commercial water-power development requires a relatively large investment of capital in dam, power house, and transmission lines.
> The water-power industry by its very nature tends peculiarly toward concentration, unified operation, and monopolistic control of the resource itself. Nor is this all. Such concentration tends to draw toward water-power interests the control of great distributing systems. This makes it by so much the more unlikely, as above pointed out, that there will be permanent competition from fuel power in the commercial power business in an area with strong water power. The water power in that area may not be able by itself to supply the entire demand for power, but the water-power interests, through the peculiar concentration forces in water power, are more likely to control the distributing systems there. Furthermore, the fact that in water power the additional cost of auxiliary steam development is relatively low in comparison with the initial investment often enables the water-power owner to add fuel-power plants under conditions that would not be profitable for a purely fuel-power concern. Thus the logical process is for the water-power interests to add also under their own control auxiliary fuel power to supply the gap in the demand and thus gradually build up a complete monopoly in power in a given area, so far as commercial power is concerned. Such, indeed, are the existing facts in a number of communities and areas.
> In so far as monopolistic power is created by these broad forces and in so far as the benefits of a public resource become by this concentration process, or, indeed, by any other method, the private property of a few, some effective policy of public control is imperatively necessary for the protection of consumers and the preservation of the rights of the public in that resource.

So we are dealing with a subject matter which is in some respects peculiar and sui generis, and it is important that we bear in mind this fact while determining upon a permanent policy with reference to the use of water power.

In 1913 I ventured to say on this floor, speaking with reference to our natural resources, such as coal mines and power sites:

> I am in favor of absolute public ownership. The leasing system is a delusion, so far as our natural resources are concerned.

The more I have studied the question and the further I have carried the investigation the more firmly I am convinced that the leasing system will bring no proper service of these utilities, and that we should adopt, without further experimenting, public ownership, development, and control of our water power. I am not going to indulge in a general discussion of public ownership at this time. I only desire to discuss the particular subject before us. Whatever may be said as to public ownership generally or as regards other matters or subjects, so far as water power is concerned I believe the Government should retain its present water power and, through municipalities, the States, and the political divisions of the States and the Government, develop and control them. And I repeat again that in discussing this subject I approach it without being consciously affected by the presence or absence of a power trust at this time. I believe the policy is the correct policy, and I accept it solely for the reason that it seems to me to be meritorious in all particulars. The sole question at issue is, What is the best policy under which to develop our water power, which nature has dedicated unmistakably to the service of the whole people?

It would seem, as a matter of theory at least—and whether it is practicable or not we will hereafter consider—that that which is peculiarly and fundamentally for the common use, which not only by nature itself but by the laws of use seems singularly dedicated to the common service, ought to be discharged, so far as possible, of the burden of private gain. That which seems set apart for the common use and to which every member of the community is to be admitted in the way of enjoyment ought not to be so operated as to be of special benefit to anyone. This water power is interwoven with and inseparably a part of the common service and welfare of the community. A power site, for instance, situated on the Snake River, in my State, would supply heat and light to every home and power for the industries in that great valley for 250 miles. No one should have in that a special and particular interest if the community can, as a practical fact, develop it and operate it so as to relieve it of that charge. Whatever profits there are should go to the people in better and cheaper service. The leasing system in no sense relieves the business of private gain. Neither will it lower private profits nor change the individuals to whom the profits are paid. Theoretically public ownership will give lower rates, better service, a greater diffusion of wealth, and more prosperous communities. The question is, Will it work out in practice?

One of the most pronounced objections to public ownership is that it would lead to bad politics, that it would make the stakes in the way of patronage that much higher for the game of politics. Especially is it insisted this is true with reference to municipal public ownership. If it were true it would be a strong argument against it. But of the two, which produces the better and more wholesome politics—public ownership, where the common good is the object to be attained, or private ownership, where private gain is the dominating element? In comparing the histories of cities of public and private ownership the balance is greatly in favor of public ownership. Public ownership has been established very generally throughout the cities of Europe. It has long been conceded that the administration of city affairs in Europe is far more excellent than that of cities in the United States. One of the reasons assigned for this is that the franchise hunters and public-utilities people are out of politics. There is no more discreditable history in American politics anywhere than that which has been associated with public-utilities politics in a number of the great cities of the United States. I do not desire to mention individual cities nor at this time go into details, but I think everyone will recall without any difficulty many of the innumerable instances of complete moral breakdown in our cities, among the great contributing causes of which was the presence of public utilities in politics. A most distinguished American citizen, now prominent in American affairs and with much experience behind him, has said:

> All sincere and fair observers put their fingers upon the public-utilities corporations in the city as at least the greatest contributing cause of the corruption of the American city. * * * Practically every State legislature in this country and practically every city council in this country was either corrupt or under grave suspicion.

Indeed, it is notorious that in several instances the cities have been driven from private ownership to public ownership in order to get rid of the disgraceful politics of their cities, which it is claimed they succeeded in doing.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. There is no one utility which has such a splendid record behind it as that of the public ownership, management, and control of water power. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the Senator from Idaho include in his advocacy of public ownership those things in which all people are interested, the Government ownership of all mines and minerals of all kinds?

Mr. BORAH. I do not now go further into that than as to coal. I include coal under this same rule which I am now discussing.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is there any difference in principle between coal and oil mines?

Mr. BORAH. Of course it is difficult to draw the line of demarcation in theory with reference to these matters, but there is to my mind a line in the practical working of the proposition. So far as I am concerned, I think that coal and water power are distinctly in a class by themselves. But we may find it advisable to include oil. We are now, however, dealing with power. I do not wish to be diverted from the real subject before us. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

I was about to say, when interrupted, the public record behind this discussion or in support of this proposition in reference to public ownership of power is one of the most interesting that can be found with reference to the public ownership of any utility. There have been very few instances in which it has been unsatisfactory. There have been a multitude of instances, especially within the last 10 years, during which time the policy has become more prevalent, in which it has been eminently successful, not only successful in giving a better service but successful in giving a much cheaper service, and successful in eliminating the public-utilities question from the politics of municipalities. I have a letter here——

Mr. POMERENE. Before the Senator goes to that, I take it, when he speaks of public ownership of water power, he means owned by the State or municipality and not by the Federal Government.

Mr. BORAH. There are instances where water power supplies the electric power for two States—for instance, in my State, where it is utilized from the same source in Montana, Idaho, and Washington. I should think the National Government would have to have at least some control of it.

Mr. POMERENE. I wanted to make it clear. I do not understand that the Federal Government controls any of these water powers now.

Mr. BORAH. I know of instances in which water power has been developed by the Federal Government which would illustrate the value of public ownership. I am speaking now with reference to that which has been developed by the State or some division of the State or a municipality.

The city of Seattle for a number of years was supplied by privately owned and controlled water power. It for numerous reasons proceeded to acquire control by the city of its power. The city engineer, who is also a member of the American Society of Civil Engineers, wrote me under date of January 10, 1918. He says:

> As illustrating some of the statements made herein, I insert at this point a statement as to the financial condition of the municipal light and power plant of the city of Seattle:
>
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Valuation | $8,156,319 |
> | Total bonds sold | 4,444,000 |
> | Expended on plant out of earnings | 3,712,319 |
> | Bonds redeemed out of earnings | 263,000 |
> | Total payments out of net earnings | 3,975,319 |
> | Gross income, 1917, approximately | 1,350,000 |
> When this plant was first projected the rate for lighting residences in this city was 20 cents per kilowatt hour. The present rate charged by the city plant is 5½ cents per kilowatt hour for the first 45 hours, with a lesser rate for succeeding periods. Power rates have been reduced to a maximum of 2½ cents per kilowatt hour and to a minimum on off peak loads of one-half cent per kilowatt hour. These rates might be still further reduced, if the city was not dividing the business with a private company, because of the larger volume of business which could be handled from substantially the same distributing system.
> Summing up, the advantages of the public-owned plant over the privately owned plants are as follows:
>
> (a) Lower cost to consumer.
> (b) Better service to consumer.
> (c) More amenable to public control.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I did not notice. Does the letter from which the Senator has read give the date of the rate made by a privately owned company?

Mr. BORAH. No; it does not give the date.

Mr. POMERENE. In other words, the difference in time when these two rates were prevailing?

Mr. BORAH. It simply states that there were certain charges under private ownership and certain reduced charges under public ownership, but it does not give the specific date.

Mr. FLETCHER. What distinction, if any, does the Senator make between a navigable waterway and a nonnavigable waterway?

Mr. BORAH. I think this is a nonnavigable waterway.

Mr. FLETCHER. Does the Senator make any distinction in his contention for public ownership between the development of water power upon navigable waterways and nonnavigable waterways? For instance, navigable waterways are under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government; the nonnavigable waterways upon public land and the navigable waterways on public land are both under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. The nonnavigable waterways in the public lands, I take it, are under the control of the States. Now, does the Senator from Idaho make a distinction in his position with reference to the character of the waterways from which the development is to take place?

Mr. BORAH. I do not make any distinction with reference to the question of public ownership, whether it is on a navigable stream or on a nonnavigable stream, and I do not see how that would have any bearing upon the question of public ownership. Of course, there is certain distinction when it comes to the question of who has control of navigable and nonnavigable waters; but, so far as the question which I am now discussing is concerned, I do not see how it would make any difference as to whether the power was developed from a navigable stream or from a nonnavigable stream, except the controversy which arises as to the sovereignty which should have charge of it.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is precisely it. In one case the State has control of the situation, I take it, and in the other case our jurisdiction is limited to navigable streams.

Mr. BORAH. I would have no doubt that by the cooperation of the State and the National Government the matter could be controlled in the interest of public ownership without any embarrassment whatever.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Before the Senator proceeds, will he inform us whether the city of Seattle plant furnishes power only for municipal purposes or is it sold for industrial purposes or is it all consumed in the city?

Mr. BORAH. The letter which I have does not state that specifically, but I think one comes to the conclusion from reading the letter that that plant supplies light to industries as well as lighting the homes of the people.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, yes; it supplies light beyond doubt, but that was not the question. I understand the city of Seattle owns the lighting system as well as the power plant; but what I want to know is whether or not it sells power for industrial purposes?

Mr. BORAH. This letter does not state.

Mr. WALSH. That is, the city only uses its own power, for what might be spoken of as municipal purposes?

Mr. BORAH. I could not state to the Senator whether it sells power to industrial concerns or not, for the only information I have in regard to it is what I have here in the letter. The report on the Municipal Electric Light and Power Plants in the United States and Canada, by Carl D. Thompson, which is published by the Public Ownership League of America, on page 130, speaking with reference to Fort Wayne, Ind., says:

> Here it must be noted that all the consumers of light and power in Fort Wayne, whether patrons of the city light or the private-owned company, have secured a reduction on rates amounting to 30 per cent since the installation of the city plant. This condition enables the consumer to light his home or place of business more elaborately and encourages the users of electricity to introduce all kinds of appliances and in this way make home life one of greater comfort and convenience. And besides a low electric light and power rate is a great advertising medium for any city, as it encourages the advent of new factories and other institutions where operating cost is an important factor.
> Our present utility law compels us to set aside 7½ per cent for depreciation.
>
> * * * * * * *
>
> In a letter to the taxpayers and citizens of Fort Wayne Mayor William J. Hosey thus summarizes the advantages of the municipal light plant:
>
> To summarize the whole proposition it may be briefly stated thus:
>
> 1. The Municipal Light and Power Works has saved the people of the city in public and private electric service bills a sum of money amounting to three-quarters of a million dollars, $750,000.
>
> 2. This sum of money saved equals the total cost of the plant to date.
>
> 3. This sum of money is more than double all tax funds used in constructing the plant, viz, $336,039.73
> 4. It has collected in seven years at cut rates $1,016,932.16 in operating revenue and has earned a net profit of $426,909.48, after paying all operating, upkeep, and renewal expense.
>
> 5. The net earnings of the plant in seven years exceeds the total tax moneys collected over a period of 14 years and used in partially constructing the plant.
>
> 6. The last taxes levied and appropriated was in 1912. Since that date the expense of extending and enlarging the plant has been met out of operating receipts only.
> 7. In 1915–16 out of gross receipts of $259,901.66 there was net profit derived of $107,014.27 after paying all operating expense, and after setting aside $29,658.99 for depreciation account.

On page 77 of this same report is a list of cities which were under private ownership and which went to public ownership, and a comparison of the rates under the two systems. In Cleveland, Ohio, under private ownership the rate was 12.5 cents per kilowatt hour, and under public ownership 3 cents; Winnipeg, Canada, under private ownership 20 cents, under public ownership 3 cents; London, Canada, under private ownership 9 cents, under public ownership 3 cents; Toronto, Canada, under private ownership 8 cents, under public ownership 3.9 cents; Lansing, Mich., under private ownership 12 cents, under public ownership 4 cents; Pasadena, Cal., under private ownership 15 cents, under public ownership 5 cents; Calgary, Canada, under private ownership 14 cents, under public ownership 5 cents; Jamestown, N. Y., under private ownership 10 cents, under public ownership 5 cents; Lincoln, Nebr., under private ownership 12 cents, under public ownership 5 cents; Seattle I have given; Anderson, Ind., under private ownership 10 cents, under public ownership 6 cents; Holyoke, Mass., under private ownership 18 cents, under public ownership 6 cents; Springfield, Ill., under private ownership 11 cents, under public ownership 6 cents; Palo Alto, Cal., under private ownership 20 cents, under public ownership 7 cents; Richmond, Ind., under private ownership 15 cents, under public ownership 7 cents; Joplin, Mo., under private ownership 15 cents, under public ownership 8 cents; Eugene, Oreg., under private ownership 15 cents, under public ownership 9 cents.

On page 108 of this same report is a table giving the savings resulting from public ownership in 45 cities in the United States and Canada for one year, to wit, 1915, and the total of these savings is $2,736,754.95.

On page 42 of this same report it is said:

> It is obvious from a study of the details of the rates and otherwise that wherever a municipal plant offers a low rate a competing private plant must cut down to meet the competition. It is the public plants that force down the rates, and wherever the private plants have been compelled to reduce their rates to meet the competition of public plants the resulting saving is due to municipal ownership.

Again, on page 60, the report says:

> The final results of all these studies which cover some 1,644 plants show that the average maximum rate for private plants is 11.4 cents per kilowatt hour and for the municipal plants 8.73 cents.

Mr. President, the most ambitious and extended effort in public ownership of water power has been in Canada in the Province of Ontario. In the hearings in support of this particular bill Sir Adam Beck appeared before the committee and gave a detailed statement of the plan, which is exceedingly illuminating. I am going to take the time of the Senate to read a few paragraphs from his statement, hoping that those who are interested in the subject will go to the hearings, part 3, before the committee of the other House, and study the testimony fully. His testimony consists of some 150 or 200 pages, covering every detail of the subject. In Canada they had precisely the same experience which we are having here. They were just about to initiate the leasing system as a national system; they did have the leasing system to a considerable extent, and particularly in the Province of Ontario. It was against the leasing system that they inaugurated the public-ownership system. It came in direct competition with it, and the facts and figures are here to demonstrate not only a better service to the public, but great deal cheaper rates to the public. I have not found anywhere a more instructive discussion of the subject from a practical standpoint than is found in these hearings, wherein Beck gives the history of public ownership in Canada.

On page 704 he says:

> The municipalities became more zealous when the report was brought down, but after a considerable amount of discussion on the report by various public bodies we found that the great difficulty that we were up against was the financing of the scheme.

That is, the financing of the public-owenship scheme—

> At that time we did not feel that we had quite as much sympathy on the part of the Government, another lease having been granted to the Electric Development Co. for 125,000 horsepower—a rebuff rather than an encouragement on the part of the Government. But there was an election—that is, a very short term of the Government in existence, about two years—and there was an electfon, and the leader of the opposition, Mr. Whitney, gave a pledge that if he and his party came into power the water powers and natural resources of the country would be developed for the good of the common people of the country.

Further on he says:

> The legislation has been satisfactory to the municipalities, and at the present time we have contracts with 225 municipalities. Of these, thirty-odd are townships. A large number are villages and towns. The remainder are the larger cities or industrial centers. We operate altogether 12 systems at the present time. These are centralized in such a way, or constructed in such a way, that they will become interconnecting eventually within one great trunk system covering the whole of the Province other than the extreme northern part of the Province, and we have only two systems in that district.
> We are proud of our system, proud of the character of the men we have had in our service. It is a great credit to them that up to the present time we have never underestimated the estimates we have prepared for municipalities in various ways, not only in connection with hydroelectric power transmission and distribution, but in waterworks, gas plants, and sewerage disposal plants—the work of the organization, of the commission, has been so extended that it covers practically all public utilities.

Mr. President, after this brief description of the first effort, we come to learn what they have accomplished:

> The commission up to date has invested $53,000,000 in transmission, distributing, and generating systems, and the municipalities have invested $17,000,000, or a total of over $70,000,000. We anticipate by 1921 we will have invested over $100,000,000 (the municipalities and the commission) in hydroelectric power systems in the Province of Ontario. We are distributing 310,000 horsepower. In 1921 we will have available 750,000 horsepower for the use of the people in the Province of Ontario.
> The average price of power or cost of power delivered to 225 municipalities in the Province of Ontario is under $18 a horsepower. We have made reductions annually. We were obliged to make reductions because the excess surplus earnings of the municipalities were such that if we had continued the rates that were originally established, based on one-half the cost that they were buying or securing power for previous to our coming into the field, we would have had such a large surplus that the whole debt of the municipality would have been wiped out in 10 or 15 years.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not know whether or not the Senator has stated the facts concerning the matter about which I am going to inquire, if so, I did not catch his statement. Does the report from which the Senator is reading state the investment in the Ontario Power Co. and what it makes per annum?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; it states it if I can turn to it.

Mr. SHIELDS. Well, I do not wish to put the Senator to that trouble.

Mr. BORAH. I will see that it is inserted in the RECORD, if I can turn to it; but this is a long hearing and I may not be able to find it at once.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have never read that report and never investigated that phase of the governmental ownership question, but I have understood that the annual profits which the Province of Ontario makes on the investment do not amount to what the taxes would amount to on the investment if it were in the hands of a private owner. Has the Senator noticed whether or not that is a fact?

Mr. BORAH. I have never heard that question presented; but I will be glad to see whether or not the report covers that.

Mr. SHIELDS. As I remember, the Province of Ontario owns the Ontario Power Co., and not the Dominion Government of Canada.

Mr. BORAH. I understand it is a matter controlled by the Province.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator has read that report and is familiar with the question. May I ask him whether the Dominion Government has assumed or attempted to assume any jurisdiction over the water power of Ontario or obtained any revenue from it in any shape or manner?

Mr. BORAH. I do not think it has; but I might be in error as to that. My information is that the Dominion Government does not assume to collect any revenue; in other words, the principle that is found in this bill is not found in the practice of the Dominion Government.

Mr. NELSON. If I may ask a further question, does the provincial government—that is, the Ontario government—collect any revenue for the utilization of these water powers?

Mr. BORAH. I can not answer that question definitely. I am satisfied that the Dominion Government does not do so, and I am also of the opinion that the provincial government does not.

Reading further, Sir Adam Beck says:

The average domestic and commercial rate in the 225 municipalities is 2½ cents per kilowatt hour; $18 per horsepower is the average price that we charge the municipalities for electricity delivered, stepped down, ready for distribution.

* * * * * * *

The saving to the users of electricity—that is, the rates in existence in 1912 and the rates in existence in 1916—for household purposes alone was $2,380,000 per annum. That is the saving to the householders in the various municipalities. The total accumulated surplus to the credit of the municipalities and the commission in 1917 is over $6,000,000. The surplus is all reinvested in the plants—none of the money can be taken out of the various systems. Take the city of London last year, after paying interest and sinking fund and maintaining the plant, keeping it all in first-class operating condition, up to original standard, had a surplus on an investment of $750,000 of $76,000 applicable to depreciation or renewal account. The plant value, because of the reserves being reinvested in extensions and improvements in the plant, is $1,200,000.

So you see they have the earning power of a million and a quarter—they have practically half a million dollars invested in the plant on which they do not pay any interest charges, only maintenance, operation, and depreciation charges. The sinking fund pays the bonds that are issued in 30 years, so that the plant in 30 years will be free of debt in the city of London.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. That statement would indicate that they do not have to pay royalties to the provincial government.

Mr. BORAH. I thought of that when I was reading it. That item is not included, so that I naturally think they do not pay it.

A corporation or company would naturally have issued three-quarters of a million of common stock, and that common stock, if the surplus had been used to pay dividends, would have paid 10 per cent on the common stock, on an equal amount of stock as the bonded debt amounted to. Money so invested in the plants amounts to $2,000,000. The sinking fund and depreciation reserve amounts to $4,500,000 in six years. Some of the municipalities, of course, have only been in operation a year or two. The net surplus is $1,500,000. That is after writing off 5 per cent for depreciation. The commission's reserve and surplus is $1,600,000. The total reserve surplus of the municipalities and the commission is $7,670,000 on a total investment of some $70,000,000.

* * * * * * *

We are able to sell power to the citizens of Windsor, which is only 25,000 population, immediately opposite Detroit, where they have over half a million population, at 40 per cent lower rates than they are receiving in the city of Detroit. And we are meeting all our obligations. In Toronto we are selling power at one-half the rates you have in the city of Buffalo, 20 miles from the Falls. Toronto is 84 miles from the Falls.

Mr. President, this commission takes its power from practically the same place that the people on this side of the Niagara River take power; and upon the Canadian side, under public ownership, they supply the power for $9 per horsepower, while upon the American side, under private ownership, it is supplied for $18 per horsepower. That comparison is found through this gentleman's testimony, where the facts and the figures are given, and there does not seem to be any room for controversy as to the contention which Sir Adam Beck makes.

They have undertaken this public-ownership proposition on a very large scale. They are supplying power to 225 cities and municipalities. They are supplying it against the lease system, and they have in some instances driven them out of business or compelled the leaseholders to lower their rates to the point which had been established by public ownership.

Sir Adam Beck gives instances where they have lowered their rates to the point established by public ownership, which was about half what it was under private ownership, and are still doing business successfully under the leasing system.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The public-ownership system is not exclusive, as I understand, in Canada. They have private development and public development.

Mr. BORAH. They have private development and public development; but this report of Sir Adam Beck shows that where the public ownership is in operation they are very rapidly taking control of the private ownership and supplanting the lease system.

Mr. POINDEXTER. But they are doing it very largely by reason of the economical competition between the public and the private systems, rather than by any arbitrary law?

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. They have a right, under the law, to have either the leasing system or public ownership.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator or to embarrass him in any way, but I should like to call attention, because it is pertinent to the main point he is now making, to the provisions of the House bill.

Mr. BORAH. I shall be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Section 7 provides:

That in issuing preliminary permits or licenses hereunder the commission shall give preference to applications therefor by States and municipalities, provided the plans for the same are deemed by the commission adapted to conserve and utilize in the public interest the navigation and water resources of the region; and as between other applicants, the commission may give preference to the applicant the plans of which it finds and determines are best adapted to develop, conserve, and utilize in the public interest the navigation and water resources of the region.

That whenever in the judgment of the commission the development of any project should be undertaken by the United States itself, the commission shall not approve any application for such project by any citizen, association, corporation, State, or municipality, but shall cause to be made such examinations, surveys, reports, plans, and estimates of cost of the project as it may deem necessary, and shall submit its findings to Congress with such recommendations as it may deem appropriate concerning the construction of such project by the United States.

Mr. President, when the Shields bill was on its passage in the Senate, I offered an amendment authorizing the reservation of such power sites as might be deemed necessary for irrigation projects and for other public works, and that was voted down in the Senate. However, the principle contained in that amendment which the Senate rejected is provided for in the section of the House bill that I have just read, and I think in that respect the House bill is superior to the Senate bill, so that the question will come on this motion to refer the bill to a conference, so far as I am concerned, as to what will be the best means of preserving such features as that of the House bill. I assume that the House conferees will stand for their bill, and if the Senate conferees succeed in getting a different bill reported out of conference, then it will be within the jurisdiction of the Senate to reject the conference report.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SHIELDS. Will the Senator allow me to call attention to one matter very briefly?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I yield, but I prefer not to get into a discussion of the parliamentary situation in the midst of my remarks.

Mr. SHIELDS. I understand that the question to which the Senator from Washington addressed himself is really a little foreign to what the Senator from Idaho is discussing, and I do not want to continue that divergence; but, referring to the Shields bill, it does provide for the development of water power by municipalities, and gives them preference over other companies. It also provides, in certain instances, for Federal development, or, in other words, development by the Federal Government when made for a governmental purpose. This bill of the House gives the United States the right, under this commission, to go into the business of developing water power for commercial purposes without limit.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I indorse the suggestion of the Senator from Washington in reference to that particular clause in the bill. That is to say, it is a step in the right direction. If they would put in the word "shall," instead of "may," I should like it better. I do not want quite so much discretion; but that is a matter of detail to consider later.

Mr. President, I give a few more paragraphs from this illuminating report.

In the hearing Mr. FERRIS said:

How do the rates in Washington compare?

Sir ADAM BECK. Our rates are about a third of what they are in Washington $49 and $18—$49 per horsepower in Washington as against $18 per horsepower in Ontario.

Mr. FERRIS. How do the rates compare on lights?

Sir ADAM BECK. One-half the rates generated from Niagara Falls.

The CHAIRMAN. And that same power was manufactured in Ontario and exported to America and distributed from the American Power Co.?

Sir ADAM BECK. To Rochester. I don't know how far Rochester is from the Falls, but I should say 40 or 50 miles. London is 125 miles from the Falls.

I read that for the comparison between the Washington rates and the rates in Canada.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho further yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should like to know from the Senator whether Sir Adam Beck, in that report, calls attention to the fact that the Ontario company is supplying a great many American industries on our side of the river with power?

Mr. BORAH. I think he does.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is a fact. The Government withdrew it, though, on account of the necessity of using it during the war.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. Does he also call attention to the fact that on account of our drastic laws here upon the subject of water-power development, millions of dollars of American capital has gone over there and made investments and located its plants in Ontario?

Mr. BORAH. Precisely; and that is one reason why I was so interested in this subject. I am coming to that in just a few moments. Where you have cheap power there is no invitation to which industry will respond so quickly; and the very fact that Ontario has developed a system of power there under which it is furnished for about one-half what it is being sold for on the American side is an inducement to American industries to leave their sites in America, go into Canada, and build their industries there.

Mr. SHIELDS. There is now in Canada one plant of $10,000,000 which left Alabama and went into Ontario on account of the restrictive law of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. That must inevitably be true. A business institution which has to pay for its heat and its light and its power upon the American side twice what it has to pay upon the Canadian side will naturally go to the other side, because the fuel proposition and the heat and power proposition are tremendous items in the question of production.

Sir Adam Beck gives instances of that which I have not marked to read, but perhaps I will insert them in the RECORD.

Mr. HAMILTON. Will you describe the hydroelectric conditions, say, in Quebec, in contradistinction to the condition in Ontario?

Sir ADAM BECK. Well, take the cities of Ottawa and Hull, that are adjacent to each other on the boundary of the two Provinces. Before hydro came there the citizens of Ottawa were paying for power generated within the city limits on the Ottawa River 15 cents a kilowatt. We bought power from the Ottawa & Hull Power Co.—20,000 horsepower delivered in the city of Ottawa. Ottawa bought out a distributing system—there were two, and the larger had bankrupted the smaller—the city bought it, and the rates were reduced from 15 cents a kilowatt to 2 cents by the City of Ottawa Hydro-Electric Commission, and the company was obliged to reduce its rates accordingly.

Mr. HAMILTON. They have no such governmental arrangement in Quebec as you have in Ontario?

Sir ADAM BECK. Only private corporations are operating in Quebec, and their prices are very much higher than the prices in the Province of Ontario.

Mr. HAMILTON. One reason why you are able to accomplish these remarkable results in Ontario is because of your nearness to Niagara, is it not?

Sir ADAM BECK. No; our customers, the municipalities, are very far distant from Niagara.

Mr. HAMILTON. I say, you in Ontario.

Sir ADAM BECK. As I said, Niagara power only was available when we began, and we were fearful that it only would be available in this district [indicating on map]. We now are 250 miles from Niagara Falls, selling power in the city of Windsor in competition with the Edison Co., and we have cut the rates in two.

Mr. HAMILTON. That is 250 miles from Niagara Falls.

Sir ADAM BECK. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. Sir Adam Beck uses the expression, "We have cut the rates." Who does he mean?

Mr. BORAH. He is the head of the Public Ownership Commission. [Reading:]

The CHAIRMAN. Then I want to know what is the difference in the cost of the use of electric power generated at Niagara Falls and sold on the American side, compared with that generated at Niagara Falls and sold on the Ontario side.

Sir ADAM BECK. Well, all the information we can get is that the wholesale price of power on the American side of the river is $18 and the wholesale price on the Canadian side of the river is $9. That is the 100,000 horsepower we bought from the Ontario Power Co.

The CHAIRMAN. The power generated at Niagara Falls on the American does not cost any more to generate than it does on the Canadian side?

Sir ADAM BECK. I think not.

The CHAIRMAN. On your side, your commission is an association of municipalities, cities, towns, and townships?

Sir ADAM BECK. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And the object and purpose of it is to generate electric power and supply it to consumers at the cost of production and delivery.

Sir ADAM BECK. At cost at the point of development plus the cost of delivering it.

I shall not detain the Senate by reading further. I have desired only to direct your attention to this experiment—an experiment which has been so successful as to cause large industries to expatriate themselves in order to get cheaper power.

Now, Mr. President, I have shown at some length—and I might have gone farther with other examples—the difference in the service and in the charge under public ownership and under private ownership. I have said that in theory public ownership is undoubtedly the better policy. I believe it has also proved to be so in a marked degree in practice.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, before the Senator goes into that, I am sorry to interrupt, but I am really interested in this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly; I am very glad to be interrupted by the able Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. A moment ago the Senator called attention to the difference in the price of electric power and light in Canada and in this country. He has also spoken of a commission which seemed to regulate the price. Was this light and power furnished by publicly owned power plants or by privately owned power plants under the regulation of the commission?

Mr. BORAH. No; it is called a commission; but it is the governmental agency or authority created by law whose business it is to own and control and operate and sell this power. They call it the Hydro-Electric Commission. That is the name by which it is created.

Mr. President, we are now about to pass a bill based upon the leasing system. If we are correct in these figures which have been presented as to the difference in charge to the consumer under public ownership and under private ownership, we can see at once the extra charge or tax which we are about to put on the communities under this bill. We can see at a glance the tremendous charge which we are laying upon the public, which, if these figures be correct, could be saved to the public under public ownership. We are about to build a system based upon a lease which may extend for 50 years. Let some one who is interested in figures and calculations take the amount of power which will probably be developed in this country, if it is developed at all, under the leasing system, for the next 25 or 30 years, and compute the income or the profit which will be derived by the private owners, when you compare what they will receive with what would be paid under public ownership. It is stupendous, and if it can be saved are we not prepared to do so?

Mr. President, in the State which I have the honor in part to represent we have a very large amount of undeveloped power. Idaho has some 5,067,000 horsepower. We have enough power in that State to light and heat every home and to operate the industries which will be found in that State for the next 100 years. If under private ownership or the leasing system you are going to charge twice what the power and light can be supplied for under public ownership, then it becomes a stupendous question to those new and undeveloped States. If, under public ownership, we can demonstrate—as they have demonstrated in Canada—that you can supply the power for one-half what it can be supplied for under the leasing system or the private system, it is an invitation to people to come into those States and develop the industries of the States and to develop their natural resources and build up our Commonwealths.

Our new States, far from the centers of population and of manufacture, have unlimited water power. Idaho, as I have stated, has 5,067,000 horsepower; Montana, 4,031,000; Oregon, 6,613,000; Washington, 8,447,000. What a world of wealth and what immeasurable possibilities are foreshadowed in these figures. It is the richest heritage that nature's God ever dedicated to a people. It will continue to serve those States and communities so long as the snows fall in the mountains and the waters flow to the sea. I feel, therefore, I can render no greater service to the people of my State or to that great northwestern empire, rich, marvelously rich in natural resources, than to help to keep this heritage wholly and exclusively for the people as a whole. I can do no greater service, it seems to me, than to help to free it from speculation and from private manipulation and gain. If we under public ownership can sell power for half what it costs under private ownership nothing is more calculated to bring people to settle our lands, to build homes and schools and manufactories, enrich our communities, and enlarge our pay rolls. We are naturally anxious to build up our new States. To do so we must use our natural resources in a way which will best enable us to compete with those more favorably situated with reference to large centers of population and industry. Cheap power will do much in this line. It will help to do for us what it has helped to do for Canada; that is, it will bring investment and business and enterprise. I repeat, there is no domestic question of such vital and lasting concern to us.

As this is principally undeveloped power with which we are dealing, because it is the undeveloped power in our States that is the big item, it is important at this particular time to determine whether we are going to the policy of public ownership or whether we are going to confine ourselves to development under the private system.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I assume the Senator is familiar, in a general way, with the bill now under discussion?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; in a general way.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether he thinks it is so drawn as to justify the belief that it will create, or tend to create, much competition with going concerns engaged in the manufacture, generation, and sale of electric current?

Mr. BORAH. That is a very important feature of this bill. In my humble opinion, the bill will not bring into existence independent power companies.

Mr. THOMAS. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. Is it not a fact that the House bill as drawn discriminates against companies hereafter to be developed in favor of those by which development has already been made?

Mr. BORAH. I am not prepared to state whether it does or not. But this is true: Under this leasing system the people who now own the developed power of the country will secure the leases. There will be no independent operators who come into the field against the five great groups which now practically control the water power of the United States. It does not make any difference to me whether there is a discrimination or not; that discrimination already exists in the economic and financial position which will surround the development of this power. Will any independent go into the field to compete under a lease with the tremendous organizations which already have the basis of their financial and their economic strength in their present ownership? So this bill, in the first place, will not eliminate private gain. That will still have to be there. The bill, in addition to that, provides for a Federal tax, which the consumer will ultimately have to pay.

Mr. THOMAS. The House bill?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. Does it not also provide that the rates may be regulated either by the State or through a commission?

Mr. BORAH Precisely; but the Senator, I am sure, will agree with me that in regulating rates and in fixing rates one of the items which will be included to be charged to the consumer is the price which the company has to pay to the Federal Government. In other words, the ultimate consumer will pay whatever tax we lay on. It will finally be passed over to the man who uses the light or uses it for fuel.

So, Mr. President, under the leasing system we do not eliminate private gain. We add an additional tax that is an additional burden upon the consumer, and in addition to that we do not change the parties who will supply the power from those who are now supplying the power, to wit, the great corporations which are now in control of the water power of the United States.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. If you will look at the record of leases now, you will find, in my opinion, that the Government is dealing with the five great groups. There is no one else for the Government to deal with and never will be. There will be no independent companies. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. I desire to get the Senator's position in regard to governmental ownership, as to the source of it. Is he advocating the control or ownership of all water power developed by the Federal Government or by the States in which the waters are to be found through their several agencies?

Mr. BORAH. By the States in which the waters are to be found, except in an instance where, as I said a moment ago, by reason of the fact that they are serving across State lines it might be necessary for the National Government to take control.

Mr. SHIELDS. Where the interstate clause intervenes.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; but as to intrastate business by all means by the development of local organizations, municipalities, and State subdivisions.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator and I do not disagree about that; if it is Government ownership there is no question about it; but does the Senator mean to use the term "lease" as applicable to the navigable rivers in States where there are no public lands, or does he mean to use that term in regard to the leasing of public lands for sites and transmission lines? I apprehend that the Government under the view the Senator entertains and that I entertain about the ownership of the waters of navigable streams outside of the public-land States has nothing to lease.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator agrees with my view upon that proposition.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is what I thought, and that the Senator did not intend to use the word "lease" as applying to nonnavigable streams.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator, however, is aware of the fact that there are those who contend that the Government has something to lease, and they seem to have had considerable to do about this bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. In the House, but not in the Senate, as shown by the votes that have been taken here on the subject.

Mr. BORAH. We do not disagree as to the legal proposition; we do not think they have anything to lease; but in its practical working I fear they will have something to lease.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will say to the Senator there could not be a broader assumption of Federal ownership and Federal control than is contained in the House bill.

Mr. BORAH. Does not the Senator from Tennessee think that many of these difficulties would be obviated if we would shape this bill a little more directly on the question of public ownership?

Mr. SHIELDS. That the States will assume these burdens or this municipal power to develop the water power within their boundaries for the benefit of the public is a question for the several States, and we can not here in Congress authorize it because we have not the authority, in my opinion.

Mr. BORAH. No; but we can frame a bill which will make it possible for the States to do precisely this thing which I am discussing, and I think we ought to do that.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think we ought to do that.

Mr. BORAH. I am pleased to have the Senator say that.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator and I do not differ about that, because I believe in the States having the property and political control of the waters of the streams within the States. The Federal Government has no control over them except under the commerce clause of the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. There is another thing, Mr. President, that those of us who have had experience can not forget nor lightly pass by. Under a leasing system the ultimate authority with which we have to deal is in Washington, from three to four thousand miles distant. Everybody must trek his way to Washington to get leases or secure modification or to obtain final determination of all important matters. That of itself produces an intolerable situation. It is not only a great and ever-enlarging inconvenience, but it is a still greater financial burden. I recall one matter alone relating to the adjustment of a single contract touching our irrigation matters which brought two separate committees with their attorneys to Washington three separate times at almost ruinous expense. Government with reference to local or domestic affairs situated three to four thousand miles from the people governed is oppression of the most unendurable kind. Under your leasing system you have all the vices and none of the virtues of public ownership. You still have the question of private gain. You have the Federal tax, you have the expense of administering it at so great a distance, all of which is finally lodged upon the people and they must pay for all these things—the business man, the farmer, the laborer, manufacturer—in increased charges. Under such a system this great natural wealth would become a source of discouragement to the people generally and a source of wealth to the few.

Mr. President, it has not been my purpose and I do not intend at this time to enter upon a discussion of the details of the bill or to suggest amendments which I think ought to be offered. I conclude by saying that I hope when the bill comes out of conference or when it finally receives the signature of the President it will be so framed as to offer every encouragement and inducement to the policy of public ownership. I do not hope, as I said in the beginning, to see a bill framed at this time wholly in conformity with that principle. But let me indulge in a little prophecy to my Democratic friends. Before two years the policy of this administration will be in favor of the public ownership and development of water power. I say that for the reason that the economic and financial condition will inevitably lead to that conclusion. This water power must be developed. It is a supreme necessity. It is a saving of coal; it never wears out; it is as good a thousand years from now as it is now, and in my humble judgment, when this leasing system begins to operate and it is determined beyond all question that the independents can not get into the field, that it is simply doing business with those who are now in control, this administration will go unhesitatingly to the development of it through those instrumentalities by means of which independents can be put into the field, and those independents will be municipalities and subdivisions of the State and the National Government.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator, of course, expresses his preference for State ownership or municipal ownership, as I understand it. There has been a good deal of question as to whether or not in the water-power sites privately owned the terms would be sufficiently encouraging to get the necessary private capital. That is one question that has been raised. Assume for the sake of the argument that the Federal Government was to transfer its title to the water-power sites to the State or the municipality. Is it the Senator's opinion that the local authority would immediately take up these powers and finance them and develop them?

Mr. BORAH. I think so.

Mr. POMERENE. Immediately?

Mr. BORAH. When you say immediately——

Mr. POMERENE. In the near future, I mean.

Mr. BORAH. I think the development at this time, by reason of war conditions, will be slow, and that is one reason which is going to put the Government into the business.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. There is a very famous water power in the Senator's State, the Cabinet Gorge water power. What municipality of the State would be likely to make the necessary investment for the development of that water power?

Mr. BORAH. What power did the Senator mention?

Mr. WALSH. The Cabinet Gorge. I suppose it represents an investment of $10,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator what independent corporation would develop that power? Does the Senator think that, in competition with the five corporations which now practically control the water power of the United States, anybody is going in there as an independent proposition and in competition with them, they having their power plants all around it, to develop that water power under the leasing system?

Mr. WALSH. I asked the Senator the question simply because there is no doubt in the world about the advisability of having these water powers owned and controlled, developed, and operated by the municipalities or by the States, if that is a practical proposition. I will say to the Senator with reference to Cabinet Gorge that a permit was issued by the Department of the Interior to some gentlemen for the development of the Cabinet Gorge power, but under the restrictions of the existing law they were unable to finance it. They feel entirely satisfied that they will be able to finance and develop the power under some appropriate legislation. So, I answer the Senator, Cabinet Gorge would be speedily developed by private enterprise with proper legislation.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator know who the parties were financially backing the proposed development for which the permit was issued?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. With what one of these other companies were they associated?

Mr. WALSH. I do not know. I am not debating that question at all nor am I concerned in it now. I fully agree with the Senator from Idaho that if we can get the development through municipal initiative it would be a most excellent thing, but the Senator from Idaho knows that the great industrial plants in his State are now being supplied by the power generated in my State, carried across the line, while they have limitless undeveloped power in the State of Idaho. I said "limitless." My recollection is that it is about 1,000,000 horsepower. Cabinet Gorge I speak of is only one site. There may be, but I can not think of any municipality in the State of Idaho that will go into the development of the Cabinet Gorge water-power site as a business enterprise.

Mr. BORAH. It is not going into it as a business enterprise. It is going into it for the public service.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, certainly; it is to develop power and sell it or deliver it upon some terms to industrial enterprises such as are in the Senator's State. The great mines in the Coeur d'Alene region are operated to-day by power developed in Montana simply because there has been no opportunity to develop the power sites in the Senator's own State. If the city of Coeur d'Alene or the city of Waha would only say, "We would like to have the Cabinet Gorge power site to develop and supply our municipal wants and also to supply the mines in the Coeur d'Alene region," I would say that would be delightful. But I inquire of the Senator whether he looks forward within the next 10 years, we will say, to the city of Waha entering into the enterprise and expending $10,000,000 for the development of the Cabinet Gorge power site for the purpose of utilizing it for the operation of the mines in his State, or must we look to private capital for the development of the enterprise?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has selected one particular power proposition around which he organizes his agument. I do not know how much it would take to develop that particular power, but I will say to the Senator that this same proposition which he is now presenting was presented as an argument against the great enterprise in the Province of Ontario, in Canada. It was insisted that they could not finance these publicly developed powers, that the leasing system was the only method by which they could secure money to develop the power. It developed that they could finance it, and they did finance it, and they have taken over a number of leases which were owned by private parties by reason of the fact that they were enabled to reduce the charge to the citizens.

The Province of Ontario has financed to the sum not of ten million but seventy million, and will soon have invested $100,000,000. If we prepare and arrange to adopt the policy of public ownership the finances will be forthcoming.

Of course, looking into the future we may speculate that they will or they will not; but I would prefer to go a little slowly, Mr. President, and have the power developed to the advantage of the entire community rather than to have it developed by private enterprise and lay the burden upon the community of paying twice the amount under private enterprise that they would pay under public ownership.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. If we take the capacity of power of Cabinet Gorge and develop it to its full extent and then place the price which will be charged by private ownership alongside of the price which will be charged by public ownership, if these facts and figures are to be carried on as they have been in the past in other places, you will see at once what an advantage it is for the public to take hold of it; and it being a great advantage, and interesting the whole community and every citizen being interested in it, why will they not take it over? I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. There is no doubt in the world about the advisability of a municipality owning its own power supply, but when it comes to developing a power such as is capable of furnishing power away beyond its own needs which it is to sell for industrial purposes it presents quite a different proposition.

Mr. BORAH. That is precisely what they are doing in Canada.

Mr. WALSH. It is precisely what they are doing in the city of Los Angeles and it is working out quite satisfactorily there. The city of Los Angeles 15 years ago, before this matter became agitated, got a special grant from Congress, and under that they have developed great power sites and they are supplying power not only for municipal purposes but they are selling power for industrial purposes. They are selling power, for instance, to the great shipyards operating in San Pedro. It works out very well there. There are many places in which it will work out well. The bill before us authorizes the municipalities to acquire rights under the bill and it also gives them a preference above anybody else.

Mr. BORAH. That is, it gives them a preference provided somebody determines that they shall have it.

Mr. WALSH. By no means.

Mr. BORAH. It does not make it imperative. It leaves it to the discretion of the officials. To that I object.

Mr. WALSH. If a private party and a municipality both are asking for a permit, the permit must be given to the municipality under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Is that mandatory?

Mr. WALSH. It is mandatory, as I understand from a reading of the bill. But if it is not I will agree with the Senator that it shall be made so.

Mr. BORAH. That is precisely what I want. I expect nothing more at this time. I do not expect at this time to have a bill which will contain nothing but provisions with reference to public ownership, but I do want a bill when the public ownership question is presented which shall compel those executing the measure to give them the preference, and that is all I hope for. When the people of a community decide they want public ownership I want that to be final.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator and I are at one on that point.

Mr. SHIELDS. Both these bills do give the municipality the preference. I have forgotten the exact language of the Senate bill, but the House bill leaves it in the discretion of this commission——

Mr. BORAH. That is what I understood.

Mr. SHIELDS. To say whether or not it is best for the development of all the water-power resources of that region.

Mr. BORAH. You see that is the absurdity of the proposition, leaving it to the discretion of a commission after the community has decided.

Mr. SHIELDS. So it is not mandatory in that respect.

Mr. BORAH. A community, city, municipality, or subdivision of the State through the judgment of the entire community determines that it wants public ownership, and then under this measure we override that by leaving it to the discretion of some one who may not be in favor of that proposition at all. It was that objection which I had in mind when I answered the Senator from Montana. I do not expect, of course, as I said, anything more when the question shall be presented than that it shall be determined on the judgment of those who are to develop the power and not upon the commission which is executing the measure.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator a legal question? In the Senator's own State and other States especially interested in the subject of water power the States have conferred upon municipalities the power to develop the power?

Mr. BORAH. That is now being arranged for. In other words, the first move has been made.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am chiefly concerned at this stage of the bill with the parliamentary situation. I have not achieved a very creditable record in this body as regards even my adherence to or respect for the rules of the Senate. I have discovered that one can get along about as well who knows nothing about them as those who are expert in their definition and construction, and inasmuch as I never perform what seems to be an unnecessary task I have not given much of my time to the consideration of the Senate rules.

There are, however, some general principles governing the procedure of parliamentary bodies found in all works upon the subject. We operate under Jefferson's Manual, and, if I correctly apprehend its recitals concerning the right to amend the House amendment, this bill is subject to such procedure. If, however, it is to be sent to a committee of conference, amendments can not be offered or considered, and some amendments should be made to the bill, or attempted to be made to it, if we are to embody in its provisions certain features that have been contended for upon this floor and which now must be considered in connection with the measure.

The bill comes here practically as a substitute for the Senate bill or the Shields bill, as it is commonly called. It goes much further than the Shields bill and covers a situation which that bill purposely avoided. It is all comprehensive in that it includes both navigable and nonnavigable streams of the country, if there be such a thing as a nonnavigable stream at this time.

The chairman of the Committee on Commerce this morning referred to the pendency here some time ago of the Myers bill, which was confined in its operation and by its terms to the waters of the public domain. Those of us representing that great region of the United States were for the most part dissatisfied with its terms and registered our opposition to it. I was one of the Senators occupying that attitude of opposition. The bill did not pass, and I think I am entirely within bounds when I say it never would pass in its then-existing form. The reasons for that statement are perhaps at present unimportant. The fact is, however, that the House by adopting a substitute for the Shields bill has put up to this body the question whether we will accept the terms of the Myers bill by the House action or whether we will consider its merits and then determine as all bills are determined.

I for one, Mr. President, am not willing that a power bill so comprehensive as to affect the people and the domain of my State and those of the surrounding States shall be enacted into law in that manner. I am not prepared to accept any measure for the disposition of the power sites and the power possibilities of the great Rocky Mountain region until all features of the measure are thoroughly discussed and their consequences realized.

Mr. President, I share very largely the view of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], doubtless for other reasons in some degree, but because I am unable to escape the conviction that, legislate as we will, electric-power generation and distribution are a natural monopoly.

Hence we may provide terms of the most stringent character both as to the disposition and as to the leasing of these properties, sufficiently explicit to satisfy their framers, with the belief that monopoly has been safeguarded, when, in actual practice, the natural laws of commerce and of industry assert themselves and monopoly will result.

Some time ago, Mr. President, this body published, at an expense of over $90,000, a report from the Department of Commerce showing the existence of a monopoly in electric power. I then regarded it—and have not changed my opinion—as a sheer waste of money, for the report established nothing new and only elaborated the well-known facts. The monopoly existed; everybody that knew anything about this subject at all was aware of the fact. I venture the assertion that not a single Member of this body has read that report since its publication, and I know that I am safe in saying that nobody outside of the Chamber ever read it, while most of the country has forgotten it entirely.

It is very laudable to legislate against the creation or existence of monopoly. Monopolistic dangers are well known and they find advocacy nowhere, but they exist and they will continue to exist, and doubtless to increase in their magnitude and possibly in their oppressive features so long as economic conditions in their evolution shall continue without direct governmental interference, and the only governmental interference which will be effective is that which substitutes the Government itself for the private control of the thing which is monopolized.

I confess, Mr. President, that such has not always been my opinion. At one time I entertained the notion that monopolies were the result of intrigue and oppression, that they were based upon artificial conditions almost entirely, and that a good, healthy, public sentiment, crystallized in appropriate legislation, would put an end to them. We have tried the experiments and thus far our efforts have been ineffectual. We have destroyed one or two of them, of which the Standard Oil Co. is perhaps the most conspicuous instance, and yet, in effect, the thing which we destroyed needed not even a resurrection in order to reappear in more vigorous form than ever. The shot fired by Congress and afterwards by the Supreme Court simply glanced from the sides of that ironclad monopoly, staggered it for a short time; it then gathered itself together, renewed its strength by coming in touch with the earth, and has been since more powerful than it ever was.

I said, Mr. President, that I was not at this time disposed to discuss the merits of the bill. Perhaps it would be well, therefore, to make no further reference to it or to its contents in even a general way. The parliamentary situation is practically this: The bill was sent to this body from the other House a few days ago, and day before yesterday, in the morning, I offered an amendment, which was printed and ordered to lie upon the table. The chairman of the Commerce Committee [Mr. FLETCHER] made a motion this morning, which is now pending, to refuse concurrence in the House amendment and to send the bill to a conference committee. I do not think a bill of this character should go to a conference committee unless the Senate is prepared to fully concur in the House amendments. If that be true, then it should follow that no bill in that condition should go to a committee of conference upon the view that the committee representing the Senate will insist upon the incorporation of its views in the bill which is the subject of conference.

In the first place, the members of the committee, however well disposed, may not be entirely familiar with all of the objections to the measure as it comes from the other House, or, if familiar with them, may go upon the theory that the view is not a majority one, and therefore should be made subordinate to the importance of coming to some agreement. It is bad practice, and particularly in a bill like this. I am thoroughly of the opinion expressed by the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] that this bill should receive consideration by a special committee, to whom it should be referred, and who will, of course, if appointed, consider the bill and report it back to the Senate.

The reasons which compel my assent to the Senator's suggestion are very few. First, the House bill is the product of a special committee. The Committee on the Public Lands and the Committee on Commerce of the other House during the years that the subject has been an active one in congressional proceedings have doubtless encountered the same objections, the same obstacles, and the same difficulties in their attempt to prepare a report upon the bill or to agree upon the Shields bill that we have encountered in our discussion and consideration of it here. Hence it must have become evident that the only way in which a bill that would command the assent of a majority of the House could be secured was through the appointment and agency of a special committee. That committee was appointed, and it took up the subject. It was composed of able and experienced legislators having general familiarity with the subject and who were very anxious to secure a measure which would command the assent of the Senate.

I do not, Mr. President, desire in the slightest degree to violate the rule which forbids too active and direct comment upon the proceedings of the other House, but I think I may refer to the fact, since it has appeared in the public prints, that a very serious difference arose between certain members of the committee of the House and three Cabinet officers—the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of the Interior—regarding the terms under which the Government would be authorized to recapture the leased premises if, in its discretion, at the end of any given leasing period it desired to do so. The New York newspapers announced at the time that a proposed amendment agreed upon and offered by these distinguished representatives of the executive department contained a hidden danger which, if enacted into legislation, would result in serious injury to the Government, the discovery of this condition having been made by a member of the committee. There was a vigorous contest in the other House over that provision, and it was adopted by a considerable majority after very bitter and sometimes acrimonious opposition. If there be such a situation, if there be a possibility of danger to the Government—a probability of danger to the Government—resulting from the active operation of this amendment, then it is more emphatically our duty to consider it from every viewpoint, and, if necessary, to hear these gentlemen regarding it.

Of course, that can be done by the committee of conference. It should be done by a committee making a report back to the Senate, because in that way only can full discussion be secured and a satisfactory conclusion reached.

Another reason, Mr. President, which I have already referred to, concerns the character of the House bill. That bill embodies the whole subject of improved water power in the United States—navigable streams and unnavigable streams, streams the borders of which are in private ownership, and streams entirely or in part in the public domain—and which, therefore, are embraced in lands belonging to the Government. Obviously the question of water power in connection with navigable streams legitimately belongs either to the Committee on Commerce or to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, or both. Quite as naturally that part of the subject relating to the public domain belongs to the Senate Committee on Public Lands, whose members have the right, and whose duty it is, to consider that subject and to report their views upon it to the Senate.

If this bill goes to the Committee on Commerce or to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, jurisdiction over matters involving the public lands must be entertained by them. If, on the other hand, it goes to the Committee on Public Lands, jurisdiction of the question of water power on navigable streams must necessarily be assumed by them. The composite character of the bill, therefore, requires its treatment just as it was treated in the House, its reference, Mr. President, to a committee specially appointed for its consideration, whose constituents shall be elected from the membership of these three committees. If then we fail to secure a unanimity of agreement, we shall at least have the consolation of knowing that we have done the best that we could under the circumstances.

But, Mr. President, there is another reason, I think, for this course. The Senator from Iowa has announced that he desires to submit some amendments to the bill. I have already submitted one, and that amendment, in my judgment, concerns a subject as vitally important to the needs and the welfare of the United States to-day as does the subject of water power and water-power control. I refer to the needed development of those portions of the public lands that are supposed to contain petroleum, whose development has been consistently and constantly restricted and interfered with ever since the 26th day of September, 1909, in consequence of which, and solely in consequence of which, we are face to face with a serious famine in petroleum and its derivatives.

The policy of the Government of the United States from the hour that the Constitution was ratified has been the development of the public domain by individual initiative, and that policy has been the basis of the tremendous development and growth of the Nation.

The hope of ultimate reward has been the stimulant which has ever driven the pioneer westward and justified his risking his life to the dangers of the wilderness and of the desert. Every gold mine in the United States west of the Mississippi River, every silver mine, every lead mine, every copper mine, every zinc mine, every deposit of cinnibar, and all of the oil found upon the public domain have been discovered through and because of the incentive given by an encouraging Government to its citizens. Interference with that policy of development, injurious in many directions, has been especially so with regard to the discovery and the securing of oil needed in the industries of the country, the demand for which, constantly expanding even in times of peace, has occasionally threatened the supply.

We are dependent, Mr. President, for oil supplies for the needs of our Army and those of our allies upon the oil wells of Mexico, and Mexico has never exhibited a more unfriendly attitude toward the United States than she has during the past six months. Her rulers have placed every possible obstacle short of hostile act in the way of obtaining and enjoying this oil supply, have imposed financial burdens in the way of taxation and export dues that are almost prohibitive, and have frequently interfered with the execution of contracts then in existence, thus imperiling not only our present peaceful relations with that Republic, but seriously embarrassing our military operations at the front. Our dependence upon Mexico for the difference between what our oil wells supply and what we need can be laid directly at the door of national administrations, Republican and Democratic. As long as we can secure oil from Tampico and the adjoining fields, as long as the wells there hold out, the shortage will not perhaps be fatally serious. How long that will be none of us can tell, since the political problems constantly presenting themselves between Mexico and the United States may become more formidable than any question of physical exhaustion.

A Member of this body a few days ago requested some information regarding the Nation's supply of gasoline, and the answer returned by the Fuel Commissioner was startling in that it disclosed a situation full of danger, and requiring in all probability the application of the most drastic remedies if we are to continue to serve our soldiers across the sea with what they must have in their daily campaigns and in the work of securing victory for our arms. A request, virtually amounting to an order, to suspend the use of gasoline upon Sundays was at once made, and it has been very satisfactorily heeded by the great majority of the people affected or sought to be affected by it. That is genuine patriotism; but, Mr. President, the saving in that one instance and in that one direction, while considerable considered by itself, is relatively small, and the demand is constantly increasing.

This body sought to meet that difficulty last winter. The Committee on Mines reported a bill, far too drastic in my judgment, far too illiberal toward the prospector and the owner of existing locations, but which was thought to be the best bill that could possibly be secured at the time. I do not remember when it passed the Senate, except, if my memory serves me correctly, it was some time late in January or early in February. It went to the House, where copious hearings were had upon the measure. The House amended the bill very materially, passed it, and sent it back to the Senate. That, I think, was in May. Since then it has been in conference, the members of the conference committee having been unable to agree. Notwithstanding the fact that it concerns one of the most vital and necessary subjects at this time that can be well imagined, far more vital than water power at this time, far more essential to the needs of the Government, no satisfactory conclusion has been reached. I do not criticize a single member of that committee; I have no doubt each was acting according to his convictions of public duty; but that, Mr. President, does not rob the situation of its very serious aspect.

I have offered an amendment to this bill consisting of the bill which was passed by the Senate, either in January or in February, and which forms the basis of the conference committee to which I have referred, because I believe, Mr. President, that the only way in which this Congress can secure action upon this all-important measure is to attach it to a measure like this, and insist that both shall go together or neither shall go at all.

Mr. President, I may be mistaken in my conceptions of duty regarding the situation. I have not the slightest desire to lay a single obstacle in the way of the power bill, if it is as vital to the interests of the country as its exponents declare, and I think they should not lay a solitary obstacle in the way of this amendment, and for the same reasons. If the bill can be reported out of the committee, we can consider it; but until that bill is reported out of the committee everything is held in suspension, and in the meantime the Government, acting ostensibly through the Secretary of the Interior, has issued an order impounding the proceeds derived from the sale of oil produced from locations made in conformity with the laws of the United States, developed by citizens of the United States, and belonging to them as fully and completely, subject only to the fact that the title remains in the Government, as any other property to which they lay claim.

Mr. President, it is a serious thing, in my judgment, for a great Government like this, by its legislation, to encourage its citizens to proceed to the development of its hidden resources, and then seek to rob those citizens of the fruits of their labor, their industry, their expense, and their risks by legislation which deprives them of those fruits.

It is worse than bad faith. It is dishonesty, although perhaps not so intended. Men are being bankrupted by these delays, by our failure to act, and by an administrative policy born on the 26th day of September, 1909. But for the Executive order of that date and those which have succeeded it, I am here to affirm that the people of the United States would to-day have all the oil and all the gas that is needed for the prosecution of this war and for domestic consumption.

I believe in conservation. Of its virtues I make no complaint. But, Mr. President, I never have been able to see the real principle of conservation in a long scheme and system of absolutely repressive legislation. We have three naval reserves upon the public domain, one of which contains vast quantities of oil, because within its boundaries are embraced a number of wells sunk by citizens of the United States on perfectly valid locations, and of which they have since been deprived. Another of these reserves is known to contain quantities of oil, and the third is so located as to justify the probability of similar wealth in petroleum. Those are being held by the Navy Department, so I am told, to subserve the needs of this country, should any great crisis overtake it. Posterity is to enjoy its benefits, if the exigencies of posterity should at any time be so serious as to demand it. We can not touch it now, because the present crisis seemingly is not a tremendous one, or not sufficiently so to justify the development of these stores of oil.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Are they going to let the next generation use it?

Mr. THOMAS. Neither the next nor perhaps the next.

Mr. President, no man has a higher opinion than I of the Secretary of the Navy. I have known him for years. We served on the national committee together for 12 or 16 years. He is a patriot; he is a statesman; and time has vindicated in a most magnificent way his administration of the Navy Department, and that, too, before his term of office has expired. Hence, my reference to these matters is wholly impersonal. I am told upon good authority that certain oil men of California have offered the Navy Department their services and their time and their money in the development of these naval reserves, agreeing in advance to accept any terms that the Navy Department will submit, their purpose being to serve their country at this time, with the cost to themselves an entirely secondary consideration, and their offer has been rejected. This amendment does not touch the naval reserves. They are expressly excluded from its operations. Hence my reference to that situation is merely because it is a cognate part of the general subject.

Mr. President, I believe that if the Secretary of the Interior could have his way, if he were the Secretary of the Interior in fact as well as in name, this bill would have passed long ago. If the Secretary of the Interior would assert his jurisdiction and insist upon operating his own department, I do not believe it would be necessary for me to take up the time of the Senate this afternoon in discussing this parliamentary situation.

But there seems to be a singular condition of public affairs with reference to this subject of oil. There are a number of gentlemen in high position, two of whom at least can be charged with being Secretary of the Interior with more truth than if the charge were made against the man who bears that title. I refer to the honorable the Attorney General and the honorable the Secretary of the Navy. The chairman of the Mines and Mining Committee, having charge of the oil bill, day before yesterday made the astounding statement to the Senate, and supported it with letters from the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Attorney General, that they have been beseeched by the committee—I hope I do not use too strong an expression—to hold a conference and agree upon some oil measure that they will permit the Congress of the United States to enact into law. One is willing; two do not seem to be especially concerned about the matter; but that is the situation. A bill of tremendous and vital importance, involving a material absolutely indispensable to the great pending national emergency, and demanded by our domestic as well as our foreign necessities, can not be passed by the legislative branch of the Government of the United States because, forsooth, three members of the Cabinet are unable to agree upon its terms and permit the bill to pass!

Mr. President, in that connection I think I may be pardoned for referring the Senate to what I think is one of the most remarkable incidents that has ever occurred in the legislative history of Congress. I mean a deliberate and willful attack upon one department by a representative of another; and it occurred in the consideration of this bill.

During the hearings before the House committee the Department of Justice was represented by the Assistant Attorney General, Mr. Francis J. Kearful, the assistant having charge of the Land Division of the Department of Justice. On the 28th day of February, 1918, he was examined, and among other things I find this in the testimony:

Mr. KEARFUL. It says—

Referring to the bill—

in a certain event—

"The Secretary of the Interior may, within his discretion, lease on such reasonable terms and conditions as he may prescribe."

Mr. LENROOT. Now, under that language, Mr. Kearful—and I am frank to say that in view of the way things have developed generally I think it should be broadened—but you have no idea that the Secretary of the Interior, even if that was enacted into law, in the exercise of his discretion would grant leases where actual fraud was proven, have you?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes; I think he would.

Mr. LENROOT. You think he would?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes. Not where actual fraud was proven, but where charges of fraud had been made and without investigation.

Which is the same thing.

Mr. LENROOT. Well, do you think that in the face of the present proceedings, for instance the Honolulu case, where you say now the matter has been reopened before the register upon specific charges of fraud, that he would grant a lease in the face of those charges?

Mr. KEARFUL. I have no doubt he would.

Mr. LENROOT. Well, I am surprised to hear that. I would not think so, but I am sure I can speak for the committee that this committee has never had any intention of granting relief to any fraudulent claimant; and I am sure the committee at all times has been willing to guard against that to the fullest possible degree.

The CHAIRMAN. Now to me that is a very amazing statement. I think that ought to be elaborated, Mr. Kearful. What grounds have you for such a statement as that? It is the most amazing statement ever made before this committee since I have sat here.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, right in that connection I would like to call Mr. Kearful's attention to the fact that the oil men themselves realize that that would hardly be a fair proposition, and have put in their amendments a proviso that reads:

"And provided further, That no person who has been guilty of fraud in the location of such oil or gas bearing lands shall be entitled to the benefits of this section, nor shall his assignee or successor in interest or lessee be entitled thereto unless he affirmatively choose that prior to the passage of this act he acquired or leased such lands in good faith for a valuable consideration, and without actual knowledge of such fraud."

They themselves do not ask anything in case of proof of fraud, and where knowledge exists.

Mr. KEARFUL. Now, what is the question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I was just simply calling attention to the fact that the oil men themselves did not ask for that which you thought the Secretary would grant.

Mr. E. C. FINNEY (of the Interior Department). I would just like to state, Mr. Chairman, that I emphatically deny that the present Secretary of the Interior or any other Secretary of the Interior would issue a lease or patent to anyone who has been proven to be guilty of fraud. It is true the department might differ from others as to whether fraud has been committed or not. When as the result of a hearing fraud has been proven, I do not think that the Secretary of the Interior would grant any lease or patent.

The CHAIRMAN. I think Mr. Kearful should be given an opportunity to elaborate on that.

Mr. KEARFUL. It was not my statement that I believed the Secretary of the Interior would grant relief in case fraud has been proven or established, either through the Interior Department or before a court; but it was that he would grant leases where charges of fraud had been made and without an investigation, or without a hearing.

Mr. LENROOT. That was your statement?

Mr. KEARFUL. Yes, sir.

Mr. LENROOT. You stated that in the present case, in the face of charges which you have made against the Honolulu company, if the House provision became a law, in your opinion Secretary Lane, without any further investigation of those charges, and coming to any determination in them, would issue these leases. Is that your opinion?

Mr. KEARFUL. That is my opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. What do you base such an opinion as that on?

Mr. KEARFUL. I base that upon the action taken by the Secretary of the Interior in the operating agreements which he has made under the act of August 25, 1914. In those cases charges of fraud and violations of the withdrawal order were made by special agents after investigations by the Land Office, and hearings were ordered to determine the truth of the charges made by the special agents. Under authority given to the Secretary to make an arrangement for continued operation and to conserve the property pending the determination of the title between the Government and the applicant, contracts were made by which the operator retained seven-eighths of all the oil and gas produced, and it was agreed that one-eighth should be accepted by the United States in full compensation for trespass upon these lands, in the event that the patents should finally be denied. Under those operative agreements, as shown in the memorandum, there was a total production to November 30, 1917, of $6,849,807. And of this amount, there was impounded in escrow for the protection of the Government in case it should finally be decided that the land belonged to the Government, $876,674. Which corresponds to one-eighth of the product with interest.

In round numbers, taking a given system of operations producing $8,000,000 gross, under the receivership, to which it was intended the operating agreements should conform, there would be impounded substantially $7,000,000, or seven-eighths for the protection of the Government in case the court should finally decide the Government was entitled to the land; whereas under these operating agreements there would be impounded in round numbers about $1,000,000, or one-eighth of the entire production.

He then mentions eight cases in Wyoming where the amount deposited was less than the total, as a matter of course.

That system of operating agreements entered into under the act of 1914—

Which was an act of Congress—

in cases of fraud charged by the special agents after investigation, and cases of hearings ordered to determine those charges of fraud, justifies my statement for the belief that under the provision of the House bill the same thing would be done.

And I may digress by saying that the average special agent out upon the public domain is like the ordinary city detective—he is there for the purpose of making charges. His job depends upon it. He must show by his acts that he is earning his salary; and the Savior of mankind, as the locator of an oil claim in Wyoming, would find Himself confronted with charges of fraud emanating from some of these so-called special agents.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, let me see, Mr. Kearful. You make no distinction between a temporary permit where charges of fraud may be pending and a permanent lease where charges of fraud may be pending?

Mr. KEARFUL. I make no substantial distinction because, while these permits were intended to be temporary, they have in effect become permanent because of failure to act upon the application for patent.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; and will you say to the committee who is the most responsible for that failure, the Department of the Interior or the Department of Justice? Is it not your own department?

Mr. KEARFUL. It certainly is not.

Mr. LENROOT. Has not your department repeatedly requested the Department of the Interior not to act upon certain applications for patent?

Mr. KEARFUL. On the contrary, that department has repeatedly and continuously urged the Department of the Interior to act upon these applications for patent.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, let's see. That is not true of the Honolulu case, is it?

Mr. KEARFUL. That was a particular situation in which the commissioner, having come to a decision upon what appeared to the Department of Justice to be an incomplete and insufficient record——

Mr. LENROOT (interposing). And an erroneous view of the law?

Mr. KEARFUL. And an erroneous view of the law; the position of the Department of Justice was that a hearing should be had to determine the facts, not that there should be any delay in the case.

Mr. LENROOT. Didn't the department repeatedly request the setting aside of a clear listing decision in order that they might litigate the matter in the courts?

Mr. KEARFUL. Not precisely. It was the intention to apply to the courts for a decision on the matter, but it was also the position of the Department of Justice that a hearing should be had in the Land Office.

Another member of the committee later takes up the examination. I do not want to omit anything.

Mr. TAYLOR. Supposing within 30 days after they make the survey and put up the stakes and make the record in the office of the county clerk and recorder, marking their ground and making the record of it, in compliance with the placer law, supposing that within 30 days or within one year—the principle would be the same—supposing that within 30 days they go, those eight men, and secure some man with a million dollars, and he agrees to go and sink one well 3,000 feet, if necessary, on each one of those dozen 160-acre claims, and he enters into an agreement that if he find oil he will sink on all of the rest of them. Does that agreement invalidate those claims?

Now, listen to this lawyer:

Mr. KEARFUL. I think it is a plain violation of law. I have no hesitancy in saying so.

That is to say, if the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], having no money, goes upon the public domain and in full compliance with the law makes a location of oil claims, he must work them himself, although it will cost $10,000 and he has not any money. If he applies to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]—who, for the purposes of my illustration, is a capitalist——

Mr. CUMMINS. Only.

Mr. THOMAS. And agrees with him that upon furnishing a certain amount of money he shall have an interest in the claim, provided the money is expended in development, that is a plain violation of law. Now, I do not hesitate to say that a man who will express such a conclusion may be a good citizen, but his first name should be "necessity." [Laughter.]

Mr. TAYLOR. You think that the original men, the locators themselves, who locate as I have stated, and the man who leases from them with the money and the ability and the intention to sink a well and who starts in and does it diligently—you think they are all of them frauds?

Mr. KEARFUL. Well, I don't like to use as strong language as that.

Mr. TAYLOR. You think they have no legal rights?

Mr. KEARFUL. It has been the practice, the habit to do it that way, and good men have done it. It is like the coal locations that were made and passed without investigation for a time, and finally it was forced upon the people of the West that that business was done rather too loosely.

Mr. MAYS. Did you ever know of any legitimate development?

Mr. TAYLOR. Just a moment—then, Mr. Kearful, if I understand you, your idea of the laws just resolves itself right back to the very first question I asked when the cross-examination began, namely, that nobody, unless he is sufficiently rich to go ahead individually and locate and drill until he finds oil himself—that nobody else can be protected under your theory of the law?

Mr. KEARFUL. I am unable to understand, Mr. TAYLOR, how a person can demonstrate his good faith in doing discovery work looking to the discovery of oil, where the drilling of a well is necessary, unless he has the means to prosecute the discovery work by the drilling of a well.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. So that the rich men would have to do all the prospecting.

Mr. THOMAS. Absolutely.

Mr. TAYLOR. Therefore, no poor man or any man of ordinary means in the entire United States has got any business or right to ever go and locate an oil claim.

Mr. KEARFUL. I am very frank to say I believe that under the present petroleum placer law it is not a poor man's game.

Mr. President, the serious aspect of these statements lies in the official character of the men who make them. As the representative of the Department of Justice, Mr. Kearful virtually declares that the Secretary of the Interior is a dishonest man, and that, in the event of the enactment of the Senate oil bill, he will so administer it as to commit a fraud and an injustice upon the rights of the people of the United States. I have waited long and patiently for some development of this testimony, either through its repudiation by the Attorney General, or some exhibition of resentment by the Secretary of the Interior, and I have seen neither. The Secretary of the Interior I regard as a personal friend; and I feel humiliated that he has not long ago brought public attention to that statement, and insisted upon its retraction. I do not know, of course, but that there may be good reasons for his silence; but it is an astonishing fact that one department, in a hearing before Congress, should so represent the moral and mental make-up of the head of another great department. Nothing can be more extraordinary, except the fact that he against whom the charge was made has so long, as far as I know, borne this reproach in silence.

Mr. President, the Honolulu case was one which, to my certain knowledge, occupied the attention of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office for months of time. They examined it from every standpoint, exhaustively, thoroughly, completely, and finally passed it for patent. The whole question was within the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior, and in adjudging it he passed that judgment which, under the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof, was virtually final. It was not until then that the Attorney General's department interfered. It may have had a perfect right to do so. I am neither competent nor authorized to judge of that fact. I am told that the differences between the two heads of the departments were submitted to the distinguished gentleman who yesterday was named for the ambassadorship to the Court of St. James, with the agreement that his decision as a disinterested party should be final, and that his decision favored the Secretary of the Interior, albeit it never has proven to be final. This, too, may be rumor; but, if so, it is well authenticated rumor.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. K'82fl in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. KING. I am not sure that I properly interpreted the last few statements made by the Senator. The Senator does not intend to concede, does he, by anything which he stated that it is not the exclusive province of the Interior Department to pass upon the applications for patent, and, after the department has made the necessary investigations and passed upon the application and clear listed it, that the applicant is not entitled to a patent?

Mr. THOMAS. That was the law.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that the Department of Justice or any other department of the Government, after the Interior Department has performed its duties as they have been prescribed by law, and along the line which I have just indicated, has the right to intervene and prevent the issuance of a patent?

Mr. THOMAS. That is the fact.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that the Department of Justice, in so doing, is following the law or is guilty of a gross usurpation?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not think it is necessary for the purposes of my discussion to answer that question categorically. I have a high opinion of the integrity, the good faith, and the patriotism of the Attorney General of the United States and of those associated with him in the President's Cabinet. My own judgment is that no one has any more right to intrude into and exercise the prerogatives of the Secretary of the Interior than has that official the right to intrude into and exercise the prerogatives of any other department.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that if the Department of Justice had adhered to the rulings and procedure theretofore observed and permitted these men who had valid oil locations to proceed and get title and develop their lands there would have been sufficient oil now to meet the demands of the country?

Mr. THOMAS. I have said so. I do not think there is a particle of doubt upon that subject.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the senior Senator from Utah?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. May I also add in that connection that there would have been ample legislation passed to take care of the development of all of the resources of this country if that conflict had not arisen?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, I think it is unquestionable, Mr. President. Deplorable as that controversy is, its most deplorable feature has developed in the present deadlock, from which I am trying to obtain relief by the amendment which I have offered to the pending bill.

It is a deplorable situation, and what makes it the more so is that each element in the situation is convinced that that is the right one and the others are all wrong. Hence, unless we can cut the Gordian knot in some way we may be face to face with a famine in oil, with the gates of Mexico also closed against us.

The distinguished Senator from Nevada having charge of the bill said the other day that if this bill were not enacted in some form the control by the Government of all the oil-producing wells in the United States was inevitable. He may be right about it, but I think, Mr. President, that that would be a most unfortunate and undesirable situation. I believe in the Government control during this war of all lines of transportation and communication. I do not believe that it should assume control of any strictly private pursuit, however necessary its production may be to the war, if it can possibly be avoided, first, because it is contrary to Anglo-Saxon notions and the rights of private people; second, because it will not be administered so well or so efficiently; and, lastly, because the production would decrease instead of increasing, to which may be added another fact—that the revenues of the Government, so sorely needed, must be paid from the earnings of companies like these, and as rapidly as they are taken into public ownership and control just so rapidly must our sources of taxation and revenue be decreased.

Mr. President, these are some of my reasons for offering this amendment and for supporting as heartily as I can the proposal of the Senator from Iowa. I had intended to call attention to a recital from Jefferson's Manual and one opinion or precedent in support of my right to move this amendment, but inasmuch as the Vice President this morning said that that right undoubtedly exists, it is not necessary for me to burden the RECORD with any further remarks upon the subject.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Colorado has offered the general leasing bill, passed by the Senate, as an amendment to the water-power bill which came over from the House. I was unfortunately not present during the presentation of the matter by the Senator from Colorado, and I am not therefore advised as to the arguments he may have adduced in support of the amendment on its presentation.

Mr. THOMAS. I have not discussed it. I have discussed the parliamentary situation.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am in hopes, however, that the Senator from Colorado will not offer the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. It has been offered.

Mr. PITTMAN. I hope the Senator from Colorado will withdraw the amendment, because I am absolutely convinced that it will not accomplish anything toward obtaining the legislation he desires, but, on the contrary, will obstruct and delay the consideration of the water-power bill, which is almost of as much importance to the country, if not of as much importance, as the general leasing bill.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will permit me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. The bill has been delayed in conference ever since last May, if my memory serves me aright. It is now the 19th day of September. This amendment may not clear the situation or prove to be a remedy, but it is the best I can do.

Mr. SHIELDS. I did not understand the Senator from Colorado fully. May I ask him a question in regard to his amendment?

Mr. THOMAS. With the permission of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SHIELDS. Did I understand the Senator to state that a deadlock in the committee of conference existed on this oil-leasing bill since last May?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. And that it seemed impossible of compromise or adjustment?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then what possible hope would you have that the compromise would be settled by putting it on the water-power bill and carrying the deadlock to two bills instead of one?

Mr. THOMAS. I am informed that the interest which created that deadlock is the interest behind this bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. Behind the House bill?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes. If that be so, then surely their desire for one ought to influence them somewhat in yielding to our desire for the other. I do not want to interrupt the course of legislation, but I see no other way of getting action at this time in the matter upon that equally important bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. I hope there is no interest affecting the Senate or the Congress that will cut out the water-power bill.

Mr. THOMAS. I use the term "interest," of course, not in an invidious sense. I mean the opinion which is behind the conclusion that this water-power bill is of prime, pressing importance. I would not want to be understood for the world as meaning that any interest other than the interest I mention has any part in either of these two measures.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have not read the hearings carefully to demonstrate or prove it, but there were interests appearing before the Public Lands Committee of the House, as shown in the hearings on the House bill, that condemned the bill the Senate had already passed and approved the House bill. Those there appearing were representatives of the so-called water-power trust, and they were very much in favor of the House bill, and said that under it there would be development, that capital would be invested, and that under the Senate bill no capital whatever would be invested. I do not know whether that is the same interest that is opposing or favoring the oil bill or not.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I think it is a very appropriate time to settle the question with regard to the delay of the conference on the leasing bill. As one member of the conference committee, I feel rather embarrassed by the delay that has occurred and by the constant and necessary reference to it. I ask that this letter from the Attorney General be read at this time. I have just received it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., September 18, 1918.

Hon. KEY PITTMAN,
Chairman of the Conference Committee on Senate Bill 2812.

DEAR SENATOR: I acknowledge receipt of yours of the 9th, which reached the Department of Justice on the 11th.

By direction of the conference committee on Senate bill 2812, you asked me to confer with the Secretaries of the Navy and Interior with a view of fixing a convenient date upon which we might jointly meet with the committee. For several days after the receipt of your letter matters of very great importance demanded my attention; immediately following this, the Secretary of the Navy, with whom it seemed proper for me to confer, was absent from Washington. For these reasons I have been prevented from sending you as prompt a reply as I otherwise would. I will ask the committee to excuse the delay and accept my apology for it.

You say that in some matters it is now contended by members of the conference that the positions taken by some of the representatives of the Navy Department, Interior Department, and Department of Justice have been repudiated by their chiefs and that these disputed facts can only be settled satisfactorily by the chiefs themselves. The head of each of the three departments must, of course, speak for himself with reference to the position taken by representatives of his department.

At different times representatives of the Department of Justice, at the request of congressional committees, have appeared before these bodies and testified as to the oil situation and legislation pending in regard thereto. I have not repudiated any position taken by any subordinate of mine, and therefore do not know of anything which requires explanation. If any member of the conference committee will call my attention to what he believes to be such a repudiation on my part, I will gladly give a prompt and specific explanation.

You also say that there "seems to be a difference of opinion among various conferees as to the attitude of the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Attorney General with regard to certain provisions of the Senate bill." On January 25 last, in reply to a letter from Hon. SCOTT FERRIS, chairman of the House Committee on the Public Lands, I wrote him a letter in which there were set out the concurrent views of the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, and of myself in regard to the relief features of Senate bill 2812. A copy of this letter appears on pages 33 to 36 of the printed report of the hearings before the House committee, which you doubtless have before you.

I have no knowledge of any withdrawal from or qualification of such concurrent views by any of the concurring parties.

The bill in question deals with many matters with which I am not familiar and in regard to which I have never expressed an opinion or felt justified in doing so. As to the relief features of the proposed legislation, I felt justified, under all the circumstances, in conferring with the two Secretaries mentioned and reporting the result of the conference. Having done this, I have no disposition to express my individual opinion in regard to any proposed departure from those views. No matter what new solution should be presented at a meeting with your committee, I would not feel authorized to accept or reject it.

In case the two Secretaries think it advisable, I of course have no objection to conferring with them further, discussing any basis of settlement presented, and reporting to your committee the result of our conference.

I am therefore disposed to believe that nothing useful would be accomplished by my presence at the proposed joint conference with your committee. However, if, after considering this letter, the committee still desires me to appear before it, I shall be pleased to do so.

Very respectfully, yours,

T. W. GREGORY,
Attorney General.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the Attorney General in that letter states that the House bill was prepared particularly with regard to remedial legislation after a conference between his department, the Department of the Interior, and the Navy Department, and that the provisions of the House bill were agreed to. He now says that the action there taken was not in conflict with the position taken by any of the departments prior to that time.

When the Senate committee was preparing this bill, December 18, 1916, for the very purpose of finally determining the attitude of these departments a joint committee was created composed of three members of the Senate Committee on Public Lands, three members of the House Committee on the Public Lands, the Department of the Interior, the Department of the Navy, and the Department of Justice. On December 18 that committee met, and there were present at that time the following gentlemen. This is taken from the hearings:

The Public Lands Committee of the Senate, represented by Senators PITTMAN, PHELAN, and CLARK; the Public Lands Committee of the House of Representatives, represented by Representative FERRIS, TAYLOR, and LENROOT; the Department of the Interior, represented by Messrs. Clay Tallman, Commissioner United States Land Office, Edward C. Finney, counsel for the Department of the Interior, and W. A. Williams, of the Bureau of Mines; the Navy Department, represented by Mr. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and Commander James O. Richardson, Bureau of Steam Engineering; and the Department of Justice, represented by S. W. Williams and Francis J. Kearful.

They were all there. The subject was discussed for a week. I was acting as chairman of that conference, and at the end of that time, for the purpose of bringing the matter to a head, I suggested a provision as a foundation for remedial legislation for the consideration of the conference which I will later read. Senator Clark, of Wyoming, then said:

Senator CLARK. That is allowing the veto power before you pass legislation. Everybody knows that if the bill is presented to the President and he says, "No; I am not satisfied," the conference report will never be adopted.

Mr. Finney, representing the Department of the Interior, said:

This controversy is all about the remedial bill as applicable to naval reserves. Are you interested in the remedial bill as it might operate outside naval reserves?

Assistant Secretary Roosevelt said:

Not a bit.

Consequently in drawing this bill we left the naval reserves out. That would have eliminated the Navy from this controversy. Mr. Roosevelt said if we left the naval reserves out of our bill the Navy was not interested in it.

Now, just a little further. Mr. Finney said:

The so-called controversy relates to sections 9 and 10.

Senator CLARK. If 9 and 10 were eliminated——

Mr. KEARFUL. Then the departments would have nothing to say.

Consequently in drafting the Senate bill we eliminated the naval reserves from any effect whatever.

Senator CLARK. If 9 and 10 were eliminated, certain gentlemen in the Senate would have something to say.

The CHAIRMAN. I will make a proposal right now:

That the provisions of the bill be modified, providing for a preferential lease, within and without the naval reserves, to claimants of mining claims who have initiated the right to such claim prior to September 27, 1909, either through themselves or their predecessors in interest, where there is no charge of fraud in the initiation or maintenance of such rights, through dummy entry or otherwise; provided that the Department of the Interior shall first find that the said claimants and their predecessors in interest have in good faith prosecuted the development of such claims since their initiation to discovery of oil.

That is the only proposition I desire to make.

Assistant Secretary ROOSEVELT. I think I may say right off that the Navy Department will approve if you insert the word "diligently" before the word "prosecuted."

Now, mind you, he is sitting there representing the Navy Department; he approved of the proposition with amendments he suggested, which is practically in the language of the bill we passed, except that we eliminated the Navy. He said we could even include the Navy if we put the word "diligently" before the word "prosecuted."

I continue reading from the hearings:

The CHAIRMAN. I want to leave that question of good faith to the Department of the Interior. Somebody has got to determine the question; otherwise we will be right back in the courts with a hundred different kinds of suits and never get anywhere.

Commissioner TALLMAN. That just applies to naval reserves.

The CHAIRMAN. I am dealing with the naval reserves. The Navy does not care how we pass this bill outside of that.

Therefore we eliminated the naval reserves.

Commissioner TALLMAN. The naval reserves, Mr. Chairman, are a very small part of the whole proposition, and there are probably more people looking for relief outside of naval reserves than there are in them. So far as the claimants are concerned, I am strongly impressed with the belief that they should all be treated alike.

The CHAIRMAN. Then put in within or "without naval reserves."

Commissioner TALLMAN. This thing has been hanging fire a long time. There are a great many cases. If we can not find a method of adjustment, it means a long period of litigation, loss, and expense to both the Government and the applicants and claimants of these lands. It seems to me that the time has not arrived yet for this committee to give up in despair of reaching some common ground. There has not yet been put before this conference any concrete proposition to agree to or disagree to. I can not say right now that I disagree with anything that Secretary Roosevelt has said or contended for, because it has not been sufficiently definite or concrete to say whether I did agree, or whether our department agrees or disagrees. It seems to me these preliminary discussions are necessary as a basis of taking up a definite proposition. When Senator SMITH sent the notice to the Department of the Interior it included two propositions to form a basis of relief. And that is what the Navy Department is chiefly interested in. We are interested not alone from the standpoint of the naval reserve but a great deal more outside of it, a very important field in Wyoming and other places. Now, ought not we to stay with this matter a little longer? We have been with it two or three years, and it seems to me we would be justified if we spent a few days longer, perhaps, trying to reach a common ground here, or at least in subjecting to a pretty thorough scrutiny these various propositions presented for relief. We have not taken up one yet as a basis of discussion or expression of opinion, and ought not we to do that first? Ought not we to take up these propositions as Senator SMITH submitted and to see what is in them?

Senator CLARK. You say Senator SMITH?

Commissioner TALLMAN. Senator MARCUS SMITH, of the Senate committee, who first took this thing up.

Mr. FINNEY. Has not Senator PITTMAN reduced the matter to a concrete basis?

The CHAIRMAN. I have made the most liberal proposition that could be made. I have eliminated the fraud class.

Representative FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, let me submit something. I suggest, and move if necessary, that the view of the conference be that the three departments consider the advisability and acceptability of the chairman's proposal; and if they do not agree with it that they come back with a counterproposal, so that we can agree to have something on which to pass. If they accept your proposal, the conference will have made progress; if they will not accept your proposal, let us have their counterproposal.

The CHAIRMAN. The conference will now stand adjourned until Friday, at 10 o'clock, and the departments will then endeavor to have a concrete proposition for acceptance.

Now, mind you, the departments did meet and considered the proposition made by the committee through its chairman, and what did they agree on, and what did they do?

Here is a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, addressed to me as chairman, and see what the Secretary of the Navy says to the proposal made by the committee:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 23, 1916.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Representatives of the Navy Department in conjunction with those of the Interior Department and the Department of Justice, after conference among themselves, have presented to me a proposed amendment to the bill known as H. R. 406, which was presented to them by your committee with the request that it be agreed to, and if not, that a counterproposal be submitted. Your proposal reads as follows:

Then there is a copy of the proposal I read a while ago.

The letter continues:

"That the provisions of the bill be modified, providing for a preferential lease within and without the naval reserves, to claimants of mining claims who had initiated their right to such claims prior to September 27, 1909, either through themselves or their predecessors in interest, where there is no charge of fraud in the initiation or maintenance of such rights through dummy entry or otherwise, provided that the Department of the Interior shall first find that the said claimants and their predecessors in interest have in good faith prosecuted the development of such claims since their initiation to discovery of oil."

The word "initiated" in the proposed amendment is understood to mean something less than claims initiated by work leading to discovery, and the phrase "in good faith prosecuted the development of such claims since their initiation" is understood to mean something less than the diligent prosecution of work leading to discovery, as the law requires. Otherwise the proposal would be to give only preferential leases to those who are now entitled to patents. The proposed amendment is understood as intended to give preferential leases on any part of the area withdrawn by the Executive order of September 27, 1909 (including naval petroleum reserves numbered 1, 2, and 3), to claimants not chargeable with fraud but who, under existing law, can not sustain their claims.

Now, here is the part I am coming to, and I want particular attention given to it, because the Attorney General in his letter has denied that it has ever come to his knowledge that there has been any different position taken by any of the departments since they appeared before the committee of the Senate. He states that the House bill incorporates the views of those three departments and that it constitutes no change of position. I want you to see whether it constitutes a change of position of the Department of the Interior or not. I am still reading from the letter of the Secretary of the Interior:

In the conference which was held to consider this proposal, the Commissioner of the General Land Office presented for consideration as a counter proposal the following.

What does the Commissioner of the Land Office submit? Listen to the reading of it. He submits the identical thing the Senate now has in its bill. That is what he submitted. The Senate committee adopted the counter proposition of the Department of the Interior submitted to its committee. We passed the bill on the strength that it was approved by the Department of the Interior, and yet we are now informed by the Attorney General that the Department of the Interior concurred in the framing and adopting of the provision in the House bill which is in direct contradiction to this. Let me read the provision. The Secretary of the Navy quotes in his letter the proposition submitted by the Department of the Interior, which reads as follows:

"That upon relinquishment to the United States within 90 days after final denial or withdrawal of application for patent, of any claim asserted under the mining laws to any unpatented oil or gas lands included in an order of withdrawal or naval petroleum reserve No. 2, in the State of California, the claimant shall be entitled to a lease for each asserted mineral location of 160 acres or less, upon which such claim is based and upon which said claimant, his predecessor in interest, or those claiming through or under him have, prior to the date of this act, drilled one or more producing oil or gas wells, such lease to be upon a royalty of one-eighth of the production of oil or gas produced and saved therefrom after first deducting from the gross production such oil or gas as may be used in the development or operating of said lands, and otherwise on the same terms and conditions as other oil and gas leases granted under the provisions of this act: Provided, That within 90 days from the date of this act or of final denial or withdrawal of application for patent, the applicant for a lease shall pay the United States for one-eighth of the oil or gas produced from the lands included in said claim subsequent to ———, at the current field price at time of production, which shall be in full satisfaction for all oil or gas extracted from said land prior to said lease: Provided further, That all royalties received under the provisions of this section from said naval petroleum reserve No. 2, whether in oil or money, shall be delivered or credited to the United States Navy: And provided further, That none of the provisions of this section or of this act shall be applicable to or effect lands or minerals included within the limits of naval petroleum reserve No. 1, in the State of California, or naval petroleum reserve No. 3, in the State of Wyoming."

That is the language of the provision as drawn by the Department of the Interior and submitted to the Secretary of the Navy and the Department of Justice. It is in practically the identical language include in the Senate bill of to-day. It fixes the royalty the same. The only difference is that the Senate bill now provides that they must pay back the royalty from the beginning of the claim, whereas the plan submitted by the Department of the Interior provided that they should pay royalties from the time of the decision of the Supreme Court declaring that their withdrawal was legal. That is the end of the quotation from the Secretary's letter. Now, going on with the Secretary's letter:

This suggested counter proposal, if enacted into law, would give preferential leases, at a fixed royalty, from and after some date to be determined, to all claimants (whether chargeable with fraud or not, and without any rights under existing law) who have a producing oil well on any claim of not more than 160 acres within any withdrawn area, excepting naval petroleum reserves Nos. 1 and 3, the royalties from naval petroleum reserves No. 2 to go to the Navy.

It is unnecessary to discuss the relative merits of these proposals, since I am unable to assent to either as a whole or in principle. My reasons for this attitude, already well known to your committee through former hearings before the Public Land Committees, may be restated as follows:

Reserve No. 2 contains in round numbers some 30,000 acres, of which 3,500 acres are embraced in unassailable patents; 15,500 acres have been patented to the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. and are now involved in suits seeking the cancellation of the patents on the ground of fraud; 2,080 acres are embraced in the claims of the Honolulu Consolidated Oil Co.; some 5,000 acres are embraced in unpatented mineral claims against which charges have been preferred. In addition to the above there are about 3,500 acres presumably not valuable for oil.

I am advised by the Attorney General that there is much reason to expect a favorable outcome of the pending litigation involving the lands patented to the railroad company (and it is also highly probable that the charges of fraud and illegality which have been preferred against those claiming the unpatented lands will be sustained in most instances). Accepting, as I must, this view of the legal department, I feel that the Government's interests, which in this instance means particularly the interests of the Navy, are too substantial to be sacrificed.

My opinion has always been and still is that whatever equities or rights these claimants have should be determined through court proceedings which have been, or will be, instituted, and that it would be highly inadvisable to put an end to all such court proceedings and determine these rights and equities on ex parte evidence.

The constantly increasing need of the American Navy for petroleum induced the withdrawal order of September 27, 1909, and the subsequent creation within the withdrawn areas of the naval petroleum reserves. The lands embraced in reserve No. 2 constitute the only well-proven and highly productive oil-bearing area now reserved for the use of the Navy. At the time of the first withdrawal, September 27, 1909, the unpatented tracts in this area were covered with alleged claims, very few of which were initiated and prosecuted in good faith; that is, by the initiation of work leading to discovery and diligent prosecution of such work thereafter. I am advised that many of the claimants have no rights enforceable in any court of law or equity and that they maintained possession in most cases by force or intimidation. The prospective prize was so rich that their successors by purchase or lease invested large sums of money in the development of these alleged claims in defiance of the law. These men are now asking the Congress to give them, at the cost of naval efficiency (which means at the cost of the national security), that to which they have no legal or equitable claim, and it is my understanding that this proposed remedial legislation is calculated to accomplish that result. I consider it to be the duty of the Navy Department to make every effort to fully protect whatever rights the Navy secured through the action of the President in setting aside these reserves for the exclusive use of the Navy, and as the head of the Navy Department I wish to make known my unalterable opposition to any measure that could have the effect of depriving the Navy of the reserves so created.

Very respectfully,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

Now, then, the Senate committee went further. It took heed of the objection of the Secretary of the Navy, and it placed in its bill that the remedial legislation should not apply to anyone who had been guilty of fraud or who had knowledge of the commission of fraud. It went further. It met the objection of the Secretary of the Navy. It went still further. It eliminated from the operation of the bill all naval reserves.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator may remember that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] during the discussion of the bill upon this floor, representing the Committee on Naval Affairs, expressed his consent, perhaps not in direct terms, but he voiced no objection to the bill, inasmuch as it had excluded the naval reserves from its operation.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I say that the conferees had reason to believe that there was a contradiction between the attitude taken by the departments when the Senate committee was considering the matter and their attitude before the House committee when the House committee was considering it. The conferees on behalf of the House have indicated very clearly that nothing will be agreed to by the House that is not approved in toto by these departments, and that if we agree to anything else it will be a useless act and a waste of time. I am inclined to believe they are right. The letters that have been received from two of these departments plainly say that they are not going to recede from the House bill at all.

What is the difference between the House bill and the Senate bill in this provision? As drawn by the Department of the Interior and included in the Senate bill there was a fixed royalty of one-eighth; in the House bill there is a royalty to be fixed at any sum whatever, not less than one-eighth. In the Senate bill it is provided that before a lease may be granted to these people they must pay to the Government one-eighth in value of all the oil heretofore taken from the ground; in the House bill before a man may obtain a lease he must pay to the Government any sum that may be determined on over and above one-eighth. In the Senate bill, where no fraud appears, he is given a lease on the mining claim that was the foundation of his work and upon which he had discovered the oil and made a producing well; in the House bill he is given only a lease on the well, and nothing else. Those are the differences and conditions.

In the Senate bill the value of the leased ground is determined by competitive bidding, with the right reserved to the Secretary of the Interior to refuse any and all bids; in the House bill it is provided that the Secretary of the Interior may lease on any terms and conditions that he sees fit at not less than one-eighth.

In one bill there is something definite and practicable; in the other it is indefinite and impracticable. One of them places reasonable limitations around the discretion of the department, while the other allows the department to run rampant. One of them protects against the misfortunes that have taken place under the leasing system in Alaska, while the other is simply renewing the same condition of affairs. Yet we have been in session, off and on, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has said, for months.

However, let me say this: It has not been as much of a deadlock, so far as the conferees are concerned, as the Senator from Colorado might think or as the Senate might believe. The action of the members of the conference committee on behalf of the House, as demonstrated before the Public Lands Committee at the time these hearings took place, shows that they favor the Senate bill over the House bill. I am not referring to anything they have said or any action which they took in the conference, but their action, their votes, their statements, as demonstrated in the hearings before the Public Lands Committee in the House, show that four of the five conferees of the House are in practical accord with the Senate side. Why, then, do they not vote with us? We have not asked them to vote with us. Why? Because the Members of the House are just as sincerely trying to pass the bill as we are, and they, in my opinion, do sincerely believe that the House will kill any bill if reported to that body which is in opposition to the single wish of the Department of Justice or of the Navy Department.

Then, you would say to us, "Let us quit"—that has been suggested by one of the Senators here—"let us quit; let us throw it back here; let us report a disagreement." We would be tempted to take such action in ordinary times and under ordinary conditions, but the country must have oil. It has got to have an increased production of oil, and there are only two ways to obtain that increased production of oil. One of them is to provide the machinery whereby oil operators may produce it, or the Government must attempt itself to produce it. That is final.

As I said before, I think it is deplorable to force the Government into a position where it has got to develop these oil lands. It can not get the experienced help to do it. Men who speculate in oil lands are of the nature of gamblers. They have sunk a hundred holes looking for oil where they have found one good one. They are not men who are working for wages. They are men who have visions; they are men who like to develop things; they are men who like to find something. If they were not, they would lend their money to some one else to take their chances on. There are thousands and thousands of educated mining engineers who are expending the money of these men. Those oil men will go to Mexico, to South America, to Siberia, to China, or anywhere else where they can have an occupation, where they can go on with the business of a lifetime. With them will go the thousands of young mining engineers who cooperate with them in that industry.

Oh, yes; the Government will increase its production of oil. Of course, they have got the pipes; they can hire drillers; but it is going to be at a tremendous expense. It is going to be at a tremendous loss, and the industry is going steadily to weaken and to go down. It is not going to be of economic advantage to this country. You are going to drive the men who put up the money for that kind of work from the country, and the men who know how to do it, and you are going to take any kind of labor if you attempt to do it.

That is not all; that is not half of it; it is not a hundredth part of it. It means that the same doctrine, the same policy that reaches out and authorizes that, is going to be extended to other industries. Why not? If you are going to take over the oil industry of this country because it is an exhaustible resource, why not take over the copper industry? You should take it over under exactly the same theory. You should take over the coal industry of the country; you should take over the iron industry of the country, the lead industry, the copper industry, the zinc industry, and the gold and silver industry. Why not? They are all exhaustible products; they all belong to the people of this country; they are all essential to the welfare and happiness of the people of the country.

The same doctrine, the same theory, the same arguments lead you inevitably to that conclusion; and yet, if we do not furnish the machinery for individuals to develop these great fields, then the Government, in the very necessity of the case, has got to establish that policy; there is no other way out of it.

Why, you say, pass this bill with regard to property that is not in litigation and leave the litigated property out of the bill? Do you not know that the Department of Justice has laid a blanket protest over every great known oil field on the public land in this country? Do you not understand that the decreased production has been caused by the stopping of development of the so-called naval reserve No. 2 in California and in the Wyoming field? Do you not know that all of the great oil experts of the country, in testifying before the Public Lands Committee of the Senate, have said that there is but one place that the Government can go to-day to increase its oil supply, and that is in and around naval reserve No. 2 and in Wyoming? We can not leave that out of the bill; it has got to be in the bill. You have either got to pass some bill that will provide for individual initiative or the Government, of necessity, will provide the means.

I think that there are those who believe that it is for the best interest of the country that the Government should do it. Having that belief, they are not helping to pass this bill, and, in my humble opinion, they would be happy to see the bill fail. Every action indicates that. That does not apply to the Secretary of the Interior, either; I do not include him in that remark. If the Secretary of the Interior had been allowed to perform the services that are allotted to him and required of him under his jurisdiction, you would never have been in this position to-day; but when other departments invade the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior, when they invade the jurisdiction of the Navy Department, when they, in fact, invade the jurisdiction of every other department of the Government, what can you expect? And yet you ask us why we have been meeting and why all this delay. It has been because we have hoped that those who have the power to prevent legislation would listen to the arguments of those who understand the situation; would banish from their minds their narrow prejudices and would be willing to permit the Senate and the House of Representatives to utilize some judgment in this matter. That they would not attempt to usurp the functions of Congress, and instead of obstructing would say, "Why, yes; we are not particular about details; we are not particular as to whether it is a fixed eighth or a minimum eighth; we are not particular as to whether it is 160 acres or one well with a 600-foot area around it; we are only particular to protect the Government against fraud; we are only interested in seeing that there is oil production and that the production goes out to the people of this country at a reasonable rate."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I have listened to the Senator with a great deal of interest, and I want to see if I am reaching the right conclusion. In this attempted conference between the conferees of the House of Representatives and the Senate and the representatives of the three executive departments, that never took place as I understand——

Mr. PITTMAN. The letter that has just been read, of the Attorney General, demonstrates that it never will take place, in my opinion.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, am I right in the conclusion that the only one of the three departments named that is willing that the conference shall take place is the Interior Department?

Mr. PITTMAN. The letter that I have received from Secretary Lane is the only one that affirmatively states that his department would be pleased to meet with us if the others would cooperate.

Mr. NORRIS. Am I right in reaching the conclusion, further, that the reason we can not get an agreement between the conferees is because of the attitude of the Department of Justice and the Navy Department? I rather gathered that from what the Senator from Nevada has stated, and I want to know whether or not that conclusion is right?

Mr. PITTMAN. I will say that, as one of the managers of the conference on the part of the Senate, I am satisfied from what has been said and what has taken place that but for the attitude of the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Navy in opposing any modification of the House bill, four of the five members of the conferees on the part of the House would agree to reasonable modifications of the House bill. Those reasonable modifications would, in my opinion, satisfy the managers on the part of the Senate, and an agreement would be immediately reached; but, apparently, the conferees on the part of the House being unwilling to make any modification or change in the House bill without the approval of these departments we invited the heads of the departments in question to come before us and tell us whether or not the position they had taken before the Senate committee was their present position or the position they had taken before the House committee. I have read to you the position taken before the Senate committee, and the bill itself shows what their position was before the House committee. It is an absolute contradiction, and yet the Attorney General declines to come before the committee because he does not know of any contradiction or any change in attitude.

Now we are back where we were before. The question is, Shall we insist upon the provisions of the Senate bill or shall we accept what we can get? Up to this time there was always a hope that there would be a reasonable modification of the House bill and an agreement approaching the terms of the Senate bill. That is the reason we kept the conference committee alive. There were gaps of a week or 10 days between meetings while conferences with the departments were going on by individual members of the conference committee. It was our duty to wait so long as they wanted light and so long as there was a hope that they could get these departments to unbend a little; and we did wait. Senators know the result. It was not the fault of the conferees that there was delay; it was the desire of the conferees to get some bill to prevent Government ownership, and I for one am going to make an effort to get some bill out right away, because I am positive in my own mind that, if we do not do so, this disastrous experiment with regard to Government mining is going to start, and start soon.

The reason I oppose the placing of the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] on this bill is simply this, that if we can not put the Senate bill or some part of it through in the present conference by reason of the attitude of the House, we can not do so as an amendment to the water-power bill. As soon as we assemble the conferees—and it may be a week or 10 days before we can do so, because some of them have gone on liberty loan campaigns—we will act, we will vote; and I believe we will try to bring in a bill. If we do not bring in a bill, it will be needless to worry about the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado ever becoming a law, because by the time it gets to conference or by the time it reaches the House there will be no public lands and there will be no oil wells in this country on the public lands not now patented that will not be in the possession of and be operated by the Government, and therefore they will not be subject to the operation of the amendment of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no desire to discuss this question further, but I wish to add one thing to what the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] has said in relation to the position of the conferees on the part of the Senate.

After meeting with the conferees of the House time and again and discussing the minor questions involved in the two bills, there is no doubt that the conferees on the part of the Senate yielded, taking the wording of the House bill; but when it came to the vital questions involved, those questions which have been referred to by the Senator from Nevada, the conferees on the part of the Senate have been met with the statement, "It is useless to go back to the House unless the House provision, word for word, is accepted and the principle of the House bill is agreed to." We have asked them to present the matter to the House and let the House vote upon it, after a statement from the conferees on the part of the House setting forth the situation and advising the House as to what is necessary in order to get legislation which they claim they are anxious to secure, and in order that we may have an agreement on a conference report. If the House votes it down, we have told the conferees on the part of that body that we will hold another conference to see if we can get any nearer together; but, as the Senator from Nevada has said, there is one member of the conference committee who does not propose to take the matter back to the House unless he can have a written letter signed by the Secretary of the Interior Department and by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask a question of the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. This is all very deplorable, I think. As I understand, the bill can not be passed without the consent of these Cabinet officers?

Mr. SMOOT. That is what we are told; that it can not be passed in the House unless they consent to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. And there is a disagreement between these Cabinet officers with regard to the provisions of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. With regard to the fundamental principles of the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. There must be a higher power to which an appeal can be made that would settle the differences between these subordinate officers. Has the conference committee attempted that appeal?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the conference committee has attempted, so far as the members of the conference committee on the part of the Senate are concerned, to meet the wishes of the House conferees. We agreed to invite the heads of these three departments to come before us and discuss the question to see if we could not get an agreement so that the Member to whom I have referred could go back with the letter which he has said he must have in order to secure favorable action by the House. The Senator has just listened to the letter from one of the heads of the departments in answer to that invitation.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is not the point. I do not believe these officers ought to have anything to do with legislation.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not, either.

Mr. CUMMINS. Nor do I believe that any executive officer should have anything to do with legislation in any way, other than furnishing information; but they have. Now, here are three representatives of one man in different departments. Why not appeal to the one man who can settle these differences between his subordinates?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, we have not got that far yet.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah allow me to get my breath a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. Do I understand the Senator from Iowa to suggest now that the Congress should appeal to the President of the United States to know of him whether we may legislate or not?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from New Mexico knows my general view upon that subject very well. I just stated that I did not think executive officers ought to have anything to do with our legislation; but they are having something to do with it; and, instead of fooling along with differences of opinion among the subordinates, if we are to be governed by Executive order, why not go to the common source, to the one man who can settle the differences of opinion?

Mr. FALL. I think the Senator's position is perfectly logical. If we are going to be governed by Executive orders in our legislation, we certainly should go to headquarters.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada called the attention of Senators to the testimony of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Roosevelt. I thought I had amongst my papers the Senate hearings before the Public Lands Committee, at which the Secretary of the Navy himself appeared, and upon this very question testified that, if the naval reserves were excluded from the bill, he had no objection whatever to the passage of the legislation. The only reason why the Attorney General was brought into the question at all was because of the naval reserves, and the locations that had been made within the boundaries of those reserves; but so anxious were the members of the Public Lands Committee to secure legislation along this line that they were willing that the naval reserves should be excluded.

Mr. THOMAS. And they were excluded?

Mr. SMOOT. And they were excluded, as the Senator from Colorado suggests.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment. I want the Senate to understand that it is not due to any lack on the part of the Senate that the reserves in California are not operated to-day. The Senate will remember that in the closing days of one of the sessions of Congress there was put upon an appropriation bill a provision for the relief of the oil producers in California and Wyoming. That was at least four years ago. That provision went to conference, but the House would not agree to it. A disagreement was reported to the House by the conferees; that action was sustained by the House; and the item went out. Why? Because there was an objection on the part of the Secretary of the Navy to it.

Now, I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I merely wish to call attention to the fact that the Senate conferees are still willing to leave the naval lands out of any consideration in this bill, and would like to do so.

Mr. SMOOT. We made the proposition not only once but we made it many times to the conferees of the House and told them that they could write the provision in any way they desired, and we called attention to the fact that when the Secretary of the Navy sent to this body a prepared bill dealing with the naval reserves and asked the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate to introduce it in the Senate, and he in turn claimed that that bill ought to be referred to the Naval Affairs Committee, a vote was taken upon it by the Senate, and it was referred to the Naval Committee instead of to the Public Lands Committee, which had had the subject under consideration for 10 years.

Mr. PITTMAN. Let me call the Senator's attention to something else that bears on this point.

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. It bears on the question of depreciation of the oil production. On August 25, 1914, a bill which, of course, had passed both bodies of Congress, was approved by the President, providing for the operation of oil lands in litigation pending the determination of the application for patent; in other words, about that time the Government had filed in effect a blanket protest against every such application for patent on the public domain. The question was either to operate those lands pending the determination of the question by a receiver of a court or to operate them through some contract with the Depart of the Interior. The act empowered the Secretary of the Interior with regard to oil lands which were in dispute, where the title was being investigated or patent was held up, to enter into such contracts as he saw fit with the claimant of the land with regard to the production of oil pending the determination of title.

It also provided for the same action within naval reserves. What was the result? The Secretary of the Navy objected to any contracts being entered into in respect to lands in a naval reserve, and consequently the Secretary of the Interior did not enter into them; but outside of the naval reserves, on the public lands, he entered into contracts with these claimants to sink new wells on the disputed area, treating the land just as though the Government owned it and requiring the claimants to pay the Government a royalty on the oil that came out of the ground.

A number of contracts were entered into in California and Wyoming on this disputed land. The production was increased thereby. New wells were sunk. It was necessary to sink additional wells. The Secretary of the Interior approved the sinking of such wells on this disputed area, but it was held up. How held up? By the Department of Justice. The recommendation by the Secretary of the Interior that these men be permitted to sink additional oil wells on this disputed territory under the conditions and restrictions that he should impose was objected to by the Department of Justice; and the Department of Justice has now gone even so far as to force the Secretary of the Interior to require these men, who were operating under the act of 1904, to discontinue operation of existing wells unless they impound 100 per cent of the oil taken out of the ground. I am informed that 24 out of 28 of these contractees who have received such ultimatum have abandoned their contracts.

That is the situation.

Mr. SMOOT. Not only that, Mr. President, but the other four of them are producing oil here, and every gallon of it is being impounded. All that the Senator from Nevada has just said is absolutely true.

Senators, this is the situation as it exists to-day.

I want the Senate to understand that the Senate conferees are perfectly willing to agree to a conference that will allow the largest production of oil in this country. That is what we want; and, as the Senator from Nevada well says, the provisions of the House bill, as far as the Government is concerned, will yield less dollars than will the Senate bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the discussion which has illuminated the situation since I yielded the floor I think fully justifies my action in offering this bill as an amendment to the water-power bill. I knew, of course, that the representatives of this body on the conference committee had at all times sought to secure an agreement upon a bill which would command the votes of the majority of this body; and I have no doubt they will continue to do so, doubtless without success.

The situation is one, I will not say which is unique, but which is new to my experience. A conference committee upon a bill involving a vastly important subject is awaiting, or some of its members are awaiting, the O. K. of certain department heads before they will agree upon a conference report, and upon the theory, doubtless, that without such approval no agreement which may be reached will become ultimately effective. In other words, the Congress of the United States can not legislate regarding this important subject unless the Department of Justice, the Department of the Interior, and the Department of the Navy approve—not one, not two, but all of them.

If it be true that the oil-leasing bill will not become a law except under those conditions, and if it be also true that those conditions are impossible of realization, then it follows that the Senate members of the conference committee must yield to the House and report this bill, a measure which I do not believe a majority will approve, or legislation must be sought in some other direction. I know of but one other direction, and that is to seek to take advantage of the desire of each of these departments for another bill, and give them both bills in one document. If their objection to the leasing bill is so insurmountable as that, the bill thus amended will fail; so be it. I do not desire to take part in any proceeding which seems to me to involve a surrender of our legislative action, not to the Executive, who has the power of veto, but to two departments concerning a matter over which they have no jurisdiction whatever.

It is a humiliating fact that the Secretary of the Interior, so far as we can judge from this condition, does not control the department over which he has been appointed to preside, but the subject matter of his jurisdiction is within the control and subject to the absolute domination of the Secretary of the Navy and the Attorney General of the United States. That he submits to such a situation is to my mind amazing; yet it is a fact that ever since the Secretary of the Interior passed the Honolulu cases for patent he has been without absolute authority in his own department.

Under those circumstances I am not disposed to vote for a bill that is otherwise absolutely unobjectionable, neither am I disposed to concede for one moment that water power is of any more importance in this great national emergency than our supply of oil; and if both fail then the responsibility is not upon the legislative department of this country but upon others.

I think, therefore, that instead of presenting arguments for the withdrawal of this proposed amendment the splendid discussion of the subject by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] only confirms my opinion of the wisdom of offering it.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have not had the privilege of hearing all of the debate on the pending motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I have not been able to be present during all of the debate. For a while I was compelled to be absent from the Chamber on important official business. I have, however, heard a part of it; and as I happen to have the honor of being chairman of the Senate Committee on Public Lands, I feel that I should say enough on the pending motion to explain my vote on it.

I have conferred to a considerable extent with those in this body who want the water-power bill as it came from the House to go to conference, who want the Senate to disagree to the House amendment and send the bill at once to conference; and I have conferred, on the other hand, with those who oppose that course and want it to go to a committee, special or regular; and I have given some thought to both proposed courses. There is some reason and argument in support of each course. However, I believe the better plan is to adopt the motion of the Senator from Florida, to disagree to the amendment and send the bill to conference.

There has been some reference during the debate to a water-power bill considered at another session of Congress which, in general reference thereto, bore my name. It bore my name because I had the honor of reporting it from the Senate Committee on Public Lands. It was in fact a substitute for a House bill which came to this body and to the Senate Committee on Public Lands, and the substitute was framed largely on a bill which I had introduced, using it as a basis. In that way, by popular reference, generally the bill bore my name. The fate of the so-called Myers water-power bill in this body is one of the things that lead me to believe that it is better not to send the pending bill to a committee, regular or special, but for the Senate to disagree to the House amendment and send the bill to conference at once.

Session after session, for years, through succeeding sessions of Congress and through succeeding Congresses—several Congresses, now—the Senate Committee on Public Lands has struggled and striven to get through this body a bill which embodied the ideas of a majority of the members of that committee and has never succeeded. It always led to interminable debate. Those who supported the bill were never able to get it to a vote; and if it had not been supplanted by other business, I think the debate might have been going on still. Effort after effort was made without success to obtain a vote on the bill. So I feel that there is very little room for hope to get through the Senate a bill which embodies the ideas of a majority of the Senate Committee on Public Lands in regard to water-power development.

When we have struggled unsuccessfully for years to pass such a bill, what encouragement is there to refer the pending bill to a committee and there to try to revamp it and reframe it and then to get it through this body?

I believe that if the pending bill were referred to a committee, either regular or special, that would be the end of it for this session of Congress, and probably for the life of this Congress. I would not expect any bill to be enacted during the life of this Congress. I would expect the 4th of March to arrive and pass by without any legislation on the subject, and then a bill would have to be reintroduced and started again in another Congress.

I am fairly well satisfied with the principal provisions of the pending bill. I think, in the main, it is a fair and workable bill. I would far rather have it than no legislation at all on the subject. I do not agree with all of its provisions. In the main, I think it a meritorious measure. I have no objection to the commission feature of it. I do not see any objection to vesting the necessary power in a commission of three rather than in one official. So far as I am concerned, I would be just as well satisfied with a commission of three as to have all power vested in one man. I have no particular choice in that respect.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. KING. As I understand the present bill, the one reported from the House, it practically turns over to the Federal Government the control, and with that really the ownership, of the waters and the use of the waters within a State—waters which are navigable as well as waters which are not navigable. Now, if my premise is correct, do I understand the Senator to admit that he is willing for the States to give away their property—property which they hold in trust for the people—turn it over to the Federal Government and permit a commission of three to control forever, or at least for a period of 50 years, the rights and property of the States which they hold in trust for the people?

Mr. MYERS. I think three officials would be as efficient and satisfactory as one.

Mr. KING. Oh, I agree with the Senator as to that. Does the Senator admit that the Senate bill deprives the States of their ownership in and control over the waters within the States which are not navigable?

Mr. MYERS. No; I do not. Section 27 of the pending bill says:

That nothing herein contained shall be construed as affecting or intending to affect or in any way to interfere with the laws of the respective States relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water used in irrigation or for municipal or other uses, or any vested right acquired therein.

This bill, as I understand, does not rob the States of their interest in or rights to the waters flowing through the several States, either navigable or nonnavigable streams. It merely attempts to regulate the use of that water in the production of electrical power. As far is the nonnavigable streams on public lands are concerned, I believe it is the intention of the bill, as it was of bills that emanated in times past from the Public Lands Committee of the Senate, merely to control, regulate, and dispose of the use of the public lands through which the water flows. It is not intended to interfere with the ownership and control by the State of those waters. No; I do not believe in doing what the Senator states in his question. I do not think this bill does it.

Mr. KING. As I understand the Senator, if he will still pardon me, under his interpretation of the bill it gives the Federal Government the right to control the use of the waters within the State, whether the waters be navigable or nonnavigable.

Mr. MYERS. For the purpose of the production of electrical power.

Mr. KING. Then, to that extent, they control the property which belongs to the State, which it holds in trust for the people. I am speaking of the water rights.

Mr. MYERS. As far as nonnavigable streams running through public lands are concerned, under the provisions of this bill I believe that a person who desired to obtain a lease of the land adjoining the stream from the Federal Government would have to comply with the provisions of the laws of his State for the appropriation and use of the water. I think section 27 makes it plain. It is similar to provisions that were at different times in the past contained in various bills reported out of the Senate Committee on Public Lands. The State controls the use of the water, the Federal Government controls the use of the public land through which the water flows. The consent of each must be obtained; the consent of the State to the use of the water, the consent of the Federal Government to the use of the land.

As I was saying, I do not agree with all of the provisions of this bill. I very heartily agree with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] that the provisions of this bill should not apply to small streams which are not navigable in fact and are not navigated, which are only theoretically navigable. I do not think it ought to apply to them, and I am very heartily in favor of a change in the bill so as to eliminate from its provisions control or authority over those streams. I believe, however, that that could be effected in conference, and I believe everything desirable that could be attained by referring this bill to a committee and then reporting it back to the Senate can be attained by sending it to conference right now. I believe the latter course would be the surest, shortest, and most practicable way of getting legislation on the subject. That is what I want. I want results—results of the right kind. I have had enough of interminable discussion on the subject. I now want legislation.

I believe that the feature of the bill to which the Senator from Iowa refers, and other features which might be improved upon, may be either eliminated or improved upon in conference, and that in that way there is some show of getting some legislation at this session of Congress for the development of water power both on navigable streams and on nonnavigable streams flowing through the public domain. Otherwise, I do not believe there is a particle of chance of doing so. I believe it is that or nothing during the life of this Congress.

For those reasons I shall vote for the motion of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I shall vote for the motion to refer this bill in the hope that something will be done by the conference committee. I very sincerely hope that something may be done with reference to the oil situation and the coal situation. I see no opportunity to do anything with it unless it is by attaching some measure which has been approved by the Senate to some measure which the administration wants and is determined to have. Then, possibly, a trade may be made. The present situation is deplorable.

I had hoped that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] would remain within the Chamber long enough to give me a little information upon the proposition which he has advanced now for the second time before this body, and that is, in the event that legislation on the subject is not enacted at this session of Congress, that inevitably the Government of the United States will take over and operate the mines which are referred to in the pending legislation. I wanted to ask him, as he spoke with such positiveness, as to what information, if any, he had upon the subject leading him to make the statement.

Mr. PITTMAN entered the Chamber.

Mr. FALL. I see that the Senator is now in the Chamber, and I will propound my question directly to him. If the Senator from Nevada will allow me to ask him a question, I shall be glad to have such information as he can furnish in answer to it.

For the second time, I think, this afternoon the Senator has stated it as his conviction that, in the event some legislation is not immediately enacted opening up the mines—that is, the coal, phosphate, and oil deposits—the Government itself will take over the public lands upon which such deposits are situated, and will proceed to operate them directly. I should like to ask the Senator if he has any direct information upon which he bases that statement, leading him to believe that such a course will be pursued; and if so, how it is proposed to carry it out?

Mr. PITTMAN. I have direct information that convinces me that that policy will be attempted. I have obtained that information from what I consider quite authoritative sources. Such sources of information, of course, are open to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. Certainly. I do not ask the Senator to disclose the source of his information nor to answer any question, of course, that might be enbarrassing to him, but I am very much interested in this proposition.

Has the Senator information as to under what law or upon what theory it is proposed to carry out these operations?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; I did not inquire into that phase of the matter.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the only expression of the legislative will upon the subject is contained in public act No. 41 of the Sixty-fifth Congress, "An act to provide further for the national security and defense," and so forth; and, I must say, it would be an exercise of such—I will not say authority, because it would not be authority—an exercise of such arbitrary power that I can not conceive that the Congress of the United States would appropriate the moneys necessary for it, nor can I for one moment conceive the idea that the President of the United States would allow any of the moneys already appropriated or provided to be misapplied for any such purpose.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator, just for information, read the particular paragraph he has in mind?

Mr. FALL. I will. I have it in my hand:

SEC. 12. That whenever the President shall find it necessary to secure an adequate supply of necessaries for the support of the Army or the maintenance of the Navy, or for any other public use connected with the common defense, he is authorized to requisition and take over, for use or operation by the Government, any factory, packing house, oil pipe line, mine, or other plant, or any part thereof, in or through which any necessaries are or may be manufactured, produced, prepared, or mined, and to operate the same. Whenever the President shall determine that the further use or operation by the Government of any such factory, mine, or plant, or part thereof, is not essential for the national security or defense, the same shall be restored to the person entitled to the possession thereof. The United States shall make just compensation, to be determined by the President, for the taking over, use, occupation, and operation by the Government of any such factory, mine, or plant, or part thereof.

I shall not continue to read; but the meaning is so absolutely plain that no legislative or judicial construction can be necessary, and certainly no administrative construction of the terms of this act would justify the misappropriation of funds for the purpose of carrying out the peculiar ideas of some departmental chief or clerk with reference to Government operation of oil upon the public domain of the United States. I could not for a moment indulge in the presumption that the President of the United States would allow any such misappropriation of the funds with which he has been entrusted for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this or of any other law; and I was wondering if the Senator knew of any other law which was considered to be in any manner whatsoever authority, under any strained construction of which the administrative department could proceed to take charge of the public domain and work it?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I do not understand the Senator's argument against the power of the President to operate under that act.

Mr. FALL. The argument is simply the usual argument with reference to the construction of statutes of this kind—that eminent-domain statutes or confiscatory statutes must be most strictly construed, and the authority goes only to the exact object specifically stated in the legislation itself; and that where the object of the legislature is so apparent as it was here—we provided for it here again a day or two ago in a bill covering the same subject—if a man owning a mine containing valuable minerals necessary for governmental purposes, or a man owning a reduction plant or a concentration plant or other plant necessary for the production of such minerals from the ore of such mine, refuses to work it, the President then can compensate the party owning either the plant or the mine, or both, take them over, and have them worked, by lease or otherwise.

Mr. PITTMAN. Suppose this situation develops: Ninety-odd per cent or more of the producing oil wells on the public domain are on land either in litigation or dispute. That is the land that would be involved under this act if any were involved. Now, that is in litigation. The title is not in the individual, the title is still in the Government, the individual asserting his right to title but the Government denying that right. If it becomes essential to increase development on that area, and the Government has no law under which it will permit the individual to increase it, would it not then be brought within the purview of the act?

Mr. FALL. I do not think so at all, Mr. President, unless the court would say the very fact that the Government undertook to operate the property under the provisions of this act would be a legal construction of their decision as to the title to the property. The very fact that they are undertaking to take possession of it would be an admission that the property belonged to the private individual, and the litigation would immediately be settled in that way and the property worked under the requisition provision.

Mr. PITTMAN. Ninety per cent of the oil-bearing land on the public domain is now claimed by the Government adversely to the mining claim.

Mr. FALL. A requisition under this act would be an admission of title, because only thus could the Government take charge of it and operate it.

Mr. PITTMAN. It is not operated at the present time for the reasons heretofore stated. If it is not operated soon through some legislative machinery, it must be operated through some other, and I assume from what I have heard that it will be operated under the provisions of that act. The Senator now says that that would be an admission of title to the claimants.

Mr. FALL. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think they would simply hold that they would take it over at the present time and operate it and permit the claimant to establish in any suit against the Government any equity or title he might have.

Mr. FALL. We differ in that very materially, and that is what I wanted to draw out from the Senator. If it is the purpose of the Government, I would unhesitatingly advise all claimants to submit, because their title will be settled immediately, and the Government will become responsible to them for every gallon of oil and for damage done.

Mr. FLETCHER. No Senator seems to desire to discuss the matter further now. I believe we shall not be able to get a vote upon the motion this afternoon. There is some executive business to be attended to, and after that I believe the purpose is to adjourn until Saturday at 12 o'clock. I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair. What step is necessary to keep this matter the unfinished business, if any?

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is the unfinished business before the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is not necessary to lay it aside for the purpose of an executive session or adjournment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; it will go on.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECIPROCAL MILITARY SERVICE WITH GREECE AND FRANCE.

During executive session the following treaties were ratified, and on motion of Mr. POMERENE the injunction of secrecy was removed therefrom:

RECIPROCAL MILITARY SERVICE WITH GREECE.

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith, to receive the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification, a convention between the United States and Greece, signed at Washington on August 30, 1918, in respect to reciprocal military service of citizens of the United States in Greece and citizens of Greece in the United States.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, September 6, 1918.

THE PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate, if his judgment approve thereof, to receive the advice and consent of that body to its ratification, a convention between the United States and Greece, signed at Washington on August 30, 1918, stipulating for the reciprocal military service of citizens of the United States in Greece and citizens of Greece in the United States.

This convention was negotiated in conjunction with the War Department and has its approval.

Respectfully submitted.

(Signed) ROBERT LANSING.

Inclosure: As above stated.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 31, 1918.

The President of the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Hellenes, being convinced that for the better prosecution of the present war it is desirable that citizens of the United States in Greece and citizens of Greece in the United States shall either return to their own country to perform military service in its army or shall serve in the army of the country in which they remain, have resolved to enter into a convention to that end, and have accordingly appointed as their plenipotentiaries,

The President of the United States, Robert Lansing, Secretary of State of the United States; and

His Majesty the King of the Hellenes, Mr. Georges Roussos, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Greece to the United States,

Who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers, found to be in proper form, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

All male citizens of the United States in Greece and all male citizens of Greece in the United States shall, unless before the time limited by this convention they enlist or enroll in the forces of their own country or return to the United States or Greece, respectively, for the purpose of military service, be subject to military service and entitled to exemption or discharge therefrom under the laws and regulations from time to time in force of the country in which they are: Provided, That in respect to citizens of the United States in Greece the ages for military service shall be the ages specified in the laws of the United States prescribing compulsory military service, and in respect to citizens of Greece in the United States the ages for military service shall be for the time being 20 to 24 years, both inclusive.

ARTICLE II.

Citizens of the United States and citizens of Greece within the age limits aforesaid who desire to enter the military service of their own country must enlist or enroll or must leave Greece or the United States, as the case may be, for the purpose of military service in their own country before the expiration of 60 days after the date of the exchange of ratifications of this convention, if liable to military service in the country in which they are at the said date; or if not so liable, then before the expiration of 30 days after the time when liability shall accrue; or as to those holding certificates of exemption under Article III of this convention, before the expiration of 30 days after the date on which any such certificate becomes inoperative unless sooner renewed; or as to those who apply for certificates of exemption under Article III and whose exemptions are refused, then before the expiration of 30 days after the date of such refusal, unless the application be sooner granted.

ARTICLE III.

The Government of the United States and the Government of Greece may through their respective diplomatic representatives issue certificates of exemption from military service to citizens of the United States in Greece and citizens of Greece in the United States, respectively, upon application or otherwise, within 60 days from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this convention, or within 30 days from the date when such citizens become liable to military service in accordance with Article I, provided that the applications be made or the certificates be granted prior to their entry into the military service of either country.

Such certificates may be special or general, temporary or conditional, and may be modified, renewed, or revoked in the discretion of the Government granting them. Persons holding such certificates shall, so long as the certificates are in force, not be liable to military service in the country in which they are.

ARTICLE IV.

The Government of the United States and the Government of Greece will, respectively, so far as possible, facilitate the return of citizens of Greece and citizens of the United States who may desire to return to their own country for military service, but shall not be responsible for providing transport or the cost of transport for such persons.

ARTICLE V.

No citizen of either country who, under the provisions of this convention, enters the military service of the other shall, by reason of such service, be considered after this convention shall have expired or after his discharge to have lost his nationality or to be under any allegiance to His Majesty the King of the Hellenes or to the United States, as the case may be.

ARTICLE VI.

The present convention shall be ratified by the President of the United States of America by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States and by His Majesty the King of the Hellenes, and the ratification shall be exchanged at Washington or at Athens as soon as possible. It shall come into operation on the date on which the ratifications are exchanged and shall remain in force until the expiration of 60 days after either of the contracting parties shall have given notice of termination to the other, whereupon any citizen of either country incorporated into the military service of the other under this convention shall be as soon as possible discharged therefrom.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present convention and have affixed thereto their seals.

Done in duplicate at Washington the 30th day of August in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and eighteen.

RECIPROCAL MILITARY SERVICE WITH FRANCE.

To the Senate:

I transmit, with a view to receive the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification, a convention between the United States and France, signed at Washington on September 3, 1918, in respect to military service of citizens of the United States in France and citizens of France in the United States.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 4, 1918.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate, if his judgment approve thereof, to receive the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification, a convention between the United States and France, signed at Washington on September 3, 1918, providing for reciprocal military service of citizens of the United States in France and citizens of France in the United States.

This convention was negotiated in conjunction with the War Department and has that department's approval.

ROBERT LANSING.

The President of the United States of America and the President of the French Republic, being convinced that for the better prosecution of the present war it is desirable that American citizens in France and citizens of France in the United States shall either return to their own country to perform military service in its army or shall serve in the army of the country in which they remain, have resolved to enter into a convention to that end and have accordingly appointed as their plenipotentiaries the President of the United States of America, Robert Lansing, Secretary of State of the United States; and the President of the French Republic, J. J. Jusserand, ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States, who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers found to be in proper form, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

All male citizens of the United States in France and all male citizens of France in the United States shall, unless before the time limited by this convention they enlist or enroll in the forces of their own country or return to the United States or France, respectively, for the purpose of military service, be subject to military service and entitled to exemption or discharge therefrom under the laws and regulations from time to time in force, of the country in which they are: Provided, That in respect to citizens of the United States in France the ages for military service shall be the ages specified in the laws of the United States prescribing compulsory military service, and in respect to citizens of France in the United States the ages for military service shall be for the time being 20 to 44 years, both inclusive.

ARTICLE III.

The Government of the United States and the Government of the French Republic may, through their respective diplomatic representatives, issues certificates of exemption from military service to citizens of the United States in France and citizens of France in the United States, respectively, upon application or otherwise, within 60 days from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this convention or within 30 days from the date when such citizens become liable to military service in accordance with Article I: Provided, That the applications be made or the certificates be granted prior to their entry into the military service of either country. Such certificates may be special or general, temporary or conditional, and may be modified, renewed, or revoked in the discretion of the Government granting them. Persons holding such certificates shall, so long as the certificates are in force, not be liable to military service in the country in which they are.

ARTICLE IV.

The Government of the United States and the Government of the French Republic will, respectively, so far as possible, facilitate the return of citizens of France and of the United States who may desire to return to their own country for military service, but shall not be responsible for providing transport or the cost of transport for such persons.

ARTICLE V.

No citizen of either country who under the provisions of this convention enters the military service of the other shall, by reason of such service, be considered, after this convention shall have expired or after his discharge, to have lost his nationality or to be under any allegiance to the United States or to France, as the case may be.

ARTICLE VI.

The present convention shall be ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, and by the President of the French Republic, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at Paris as soon as possible. It shall come into operation on the date on which the ratifications are exchanged and shall remain in force until the expiration of 60 days after either of the contracting parties shall have given notice of termination to the other. Whereupon any citizen of either country incorporated into the military service of the other under this convention shall be as soon as possible discharged therefrom.

It witness whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present convention and have affixed thereto their seals.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, September 19, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty Father, continue, we beseech Thee, Thy favors unto the entente powers. Make them firm to resist and strong to press forward to a wise and permanent peace, that the horrors of war may pass from the face of the earth and good prevail everywhere.

We thank Thee that the people of America are ready and willing to uphold our President in his answer to those who are asking for a peace parley which would only prolong the agony. We pray for peace, but let it be a peace which will hallow Thy name. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11283) to amend and reenact sections 4, 11, 16, 19, and 22 of the act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act, and sections 5208 and 5209, Revised Statutes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 12923) to supplement the second liberty-bond act as amended, and for other purposes, had requested a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. PENROSE, and Mr. LODGE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 4871) to authorize the Philadelphia, Harrisburg & Pittsburgh Railroad Co., its lessees, successors, and assigns, to construct a bridge across the Susquehanna River, from the city of Harrisburg, Dauphin County, Pa., to the borough of Lemoyne, Cumberland County, Pa., and in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 4871. An act to authorize the Philadelphia, Harrisburg & Pittsburgh Railroad Co., its lessees, successors, and assigns, to construct a bridge across the Susquehanna River from the city of Harrisburg, Dauphin County, Pa., to the borough of Lemoyne, Cumberland County, Pa.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

CORRECTION—AMENDMENT TO FEDERAL RESERVE ACT (H. R. 11283).

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct the attention of the Chair and also the attention of the House to the conference report which was agreed upon last evening and also to the report which has just been announced as agreed to by the Senate. The Senate in the report says that "the Senate recede from its disagreement to its amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 and agree to the same." Now, of course, those last four or five words, "and agree to the same" are surplusage and ought not to be in the report, and also as to the Senate's action the same language is used; and, furthermore, that "the Senate recede from its amendment to the title, and the House agree to the same."

That is incorrect and ought not to be incorporated in the report. For the purposes of the RECORD I think this statement ought to be made in order that in the future these reports may be prepared with a little more care.

The SPEAKER. These were Senate amendments, were they?

Mr. WALSH. Senate amendments and the Senate receded from them.

The SPEAKER. The Senate receded, and then it was decided that the Senate agreed, to what?

Mr. WALSH. They could not agree to amendments that they receded from.

Mr. STAFFORD. While it may be surplusage, that language does not conflict with the action of the Senate in receding from their amendments. It is not in opposition to the action of the conferees.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], if they leave it in there, would it not be surplusage? It says that the Senate recedes from the amendments and agrees to the same.

Mr. STAFFORD. We have before us a question of construction. What is the construction of those two phrases? One is very clear—that they recede from the Senate amendments. Now, can that language be in any way interpreted so as to make it harmonious with that action? I say it can be.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not going to argue it with the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. While it is not in good form, it does not in any way nullify the report.

The SPEAKER. When the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] gets here, I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] will call his attention to it.

Mr. WALSH. I will. I am glad to have the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] agree that it is not good form.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thank the gentleman for that compliment.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the corrections made as indicated by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks to vacate the proceedings by which that conference report was agreed to. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, how are you going to amend a conference report?

The SPEAKER. That is so, too.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it would be a hard matter to do that now and strike something out of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I object to the motion to vacate the proceedings at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] objects to the motion to vacate the proceedings.

Mr. GLASS. The phrase called attention to by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is undoubtedly surplusage, but I do not know that it does any harm if permitted to remain.

Mr. GARNER. Leave it like it is, and have the bill enrolled and sent to the President, and let him sign it.

Mr. FOSTER. It does not invalidate the conference report or the bill, does it, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. GLASS. I do not know that I would be authorized to make a change without taking it back to the conferees.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair thinks.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not the engrossed copy of the bill as it originally passed the House without the Senate amendments?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. The engrossed bill, of course, went over to the Senate.

Mr. FOSTER. This has nothing to do with anything that goes in the bill, as I understand it, except that the Senate receded from its amendments.

The SPEAKER. I know; but it says the Senate recedes from the amendments, and then it says it agrees to them.

Mr. FOSTER. Receded and agreed to the same, but that does not affect the bill at all, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Well, I do not know——

Mr. GARNER. The information ought to be from the enrolling clerk. If the bill contains the language of the original bill the matter goes on and becomes a law as intended by the conferees.

Mr. FOSTER. You can not go back of the returns in reference to a little surplusage in the language.

Mr. STAFFORD. Further, Mr. Speaker, we have the statement of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the chairman of the committee, in presenting this conference report last night, that the Senate conferees had receded from the Senate amendments and that the bill as agreed to was the House bill in toto. The enrolling clerks certainly have that information.

The SPEAKER. It seems to the Chair that it is not a parliamentary question exactly, but if the enrolling clerk enrolled the bill as it passed the House originally and the Speaker signs it, and the Vice President and the President sign it, that is the end of it. That would be my offhand opinion about it. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized.

THE REVENUE BILL.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the revenue bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the revenue bill. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12863, the revenue bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I was recognized last night, and——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. An agreement was entered into yesterday afternoon to begin the discussion this morning of the so-called cotton amendment. Is that in order now?

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair recalls, the agreement provided that these amendments should be taken up immediately on the resumption by the committee of its session this morning. If the Chair's recollection is correct as to the agreement, that would make the cotton amendments come on before anything else.

Mr. DYER. When the committee rose last evening the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] rose and moved to strike out the last word. He was recognized, and at the suggestion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] the committee rose, with the understanding, as the RECORD shows, that the gentleman from Minnesota should have opportunity this morning to discuss the section which had just been read.

The CHAIRMAN. That is perfectly true. The Chair recalls that. The gentleman has stated it exactly as it occurred. But prior to that time there had been an agreement with respect to the cotton amendments, that they should be taken up this morning immediately on the resumption by the committee of its session. If that agreement is followed, the gentleman from Minnesota would follow that, but the prior agreement would make that subject first to the discussion of the cotton amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from Minnesota that he make his argument when we get to reading the bill. It would be in order then.

Mr. STEENERSON. That was the reading of the parcel-post provision.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to offer a lot of committee amendments to the section that we passed over, and then after that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] will be discussed, and then we will go back to that proposition that we left off with yesterday.

Mr. STEENERSON. I desire to discuss the parcel-post tax.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I suggest that it first be disposed of and then we may proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota does not lose his rights, but the Chair thinks that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is entitled to offer his amendment by virtue of the agreement made yesterday.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CRISP. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRISP. What is pending before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I suggest that the amendment be read.

Mr. CRISP. I want to reserve a point of order against the amendment. I made it yesterday, and I desire to renew it now.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will come up subject to the reservation of a point of order.

Mr. KITCHIN. I suggest that we take up now some amendments that the committee want to offer, and then after that the gentleman from Pennsylvania can proceed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to take up, in connection with the bill, certain amendments, after which the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] will be considered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. And I want to return to the oil and gas provisions. I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. HARDY. Can the gentleman state whether or not the Moore amendment is offered?

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KITCHIN: Page 115, line 23, after the word "That," insert the following: "on and after November 1, 1918."

Mr. KITCHIN. The committee failed to note the date on which this would take effect.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be reported again.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KITCHIN: Page 115, line 23, after the word "That," insert the following: "on and after November 1, 1918."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire as to how much revenue is expected to be derived from the respective paragraphs of which this amendment is a part? Yesterday in the consideration of this bill I was absent from the Chamber at luncheon when these paragraphs were read. I wish to obtain the information that I now seek to obtain from the chairman of the committee.

Mr. KITCHIN. It is estimated that the tax on soft drinks, ice cream, and so forth, sold at soda fountains and similar places, will yield $27,000,000 during a 12-month period.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is on the soft-drink item, exclusive of near beer?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; that is exclusive of cereal beverages.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman know whether it is contemplated by the Food Administration or the Fuel Administration or the Railroad Administration to curtail the output of soft drinks, independent of near beer?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know. They propose to curtail the use of sugar, and that would curtail the use of it in soft drinks.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the President's proclamation just promulgated, it extends to near beer as well as beer and lager beer.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is my understanding.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much was it estimated by the committee could be raised on the manufacture of near beer, beer, lager beer, and other maltous beverages?

Mr. KITCHIN. On cereal beverages $24,000,000 and from fermented liquors such as beer $240,000,000 for a 12-month period.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the $24,000,000 refers to near-beer products?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has any estimate been made as to the revenue that will be derived from Coca Cola and such compounds containing no alcoholic content?

Mr. KITCHIN. It is estimated that the revenue for a 12-month period from all soft drinks sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, in bottles or other closed containers, will amount to $10,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought the gentleman said $37,000,000 from soft drinks?

Mr. KITCHIN. Thirty-seven million dollars from soft drinks mixed and sold at the soda fountains and ice-cream parlors.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the tax on bitters which contain a considerable alcoholic content?

Mr. KITCHIN. It depends on how large a per cent of alcohol is in them. The alcohol in bitters or in any other kind of medicine pays at the rate of $4.40 a gallon.

Mr. STAFFORD. I noticed in the drug schedule that the word "bitters" was included, to pay a special tax which had no relation to beverages.

Mr. KITCHIN. Bitters would also pay the alcohol tax of $4.40 a gallon.

Mr. STAFFORD. No action has been taken by the committee to make up this large deficiency in revenue that will be caused by reason of the President's order forbidding the further manufacture of near beer and beer?

Mr. KITCHIN. No action has been taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 116, line 5, after the word "sold," insert the following: "on or after such date"; and in line 9, after "vendor," insert the following: "at the time of the sale."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 116, lines 14 and 15, strike out the word "hereafter"; in line 16, after the word "and," insert the word "hereafter" and after the word "sold" insert the words "by the manufacturer or importer."

Mr. KITCHIN. So that it will read as follows:

That upon cigars and cigarettes manufactured in or imported into the United States and hereafter sold by the manufacturer or importer.

They had the word "hereafter" in the wrong place, so that it read "hereafter manufactured" instead of "hereafter sold." That corrects it.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think there are certain other words that should be put in the proper place—"at the time of the sale."

Mr. KITCHIN. Those words were put in in line 9—

Such tax shall be paid by the purchaser to the vendor at the time of the sale.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment which has been reported by the Clerk.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Another amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is to the same effect, to put the word "hereafter" in the right place.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 118, line 23, strike out the word "hereafter"; in line 25, before the word "sold," insert the word "hereafter"; and after the word "sold" and before the comma insert the words "by the manufacturer or importer."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. There is another amendment to the same effect.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 121, line 14, after the word "and" insert the word "hereafter," and after the word "sold" insert the words "by the manufacturer or importer."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. The committee offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 121, line 21, strike out "2 cents" and insert "1 cent"; strike out "100" and insert "50."

Mr. KITCHIN. That is 1 cent for every 50 cigarette papers or fraction thereof instead of 2 cents for every 100.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 121, line 22, strike out "4" and insert "2"; lines 22 and 23, strike out "100" and insert "50."

Mr. KITCHIN. Instead of 4 cents for each 100 or fraction thereof, 2 cents for each 50 or fraction thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. I offer another amendment. These are sporting goods that were left out of the sporting goods schedule that ought to be included.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 127, line 21, strike out "golf clubs, baseball bats" and insert in lieu thereof "nets, racket covers and presses, skates, snowshoes, skis, toboggans, canoe paddles and cushions, polo mallets, baseball bats, gloves, masks, protectors, shoes and uniforms, football helmets, harness and goals, basket-ball goals and uniforms, golf bags and clubs."

That puts baseball bats and golf clubs back into the bill in the proper place.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment, to add other sporting goods.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 128, line 2, after the word "games," and the comma insert "and all other articles commonly and commercially known as sporting goods," and add a comma.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina in reference to an amendment on page 124, subparagraph "b."

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; that is the gentleman's amendment. The committee has considered it and will adopt it as its amendment, and I therefore offer it as a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 124, line 20, after the word "organization," insert "or exclusively to the benefit of persons in the military or naval forces of the United States," and add a comma.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 129, strike out lines 7 and 8. In line 9, strike out "21" and insert "19." Line 11, strike out "22" and insert "20." Line 12, strike out "23" and insert "21." Line 14, strike out "24" and insert "22." Line 15, strike out "25" and insert "23." Line 21, strike out "26" and insert "24."

Mr. KITCHIN. That amendment is to strike out the tax on duplicating and adding machines, and the changes of figures are to properly number the paragraphs.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the committee the reason that prompted the committee in relieving from the 10 per cent tax duplicating and adding machines? I see you still tax cash registers.

Mr. KITCHIN. Adding machines and duplicating machines are more in the nature of necessities than cash registers. Also the different bureaus of the Government are purchasing probably two-thirds of the entire production of these machines.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is no argument, even though the Government would pay the additional tax, it would get it back immediately.

Mr. KITCHIN. But the gentleman asked me the reason why we did it and not for the arguments. The reason is because these machines are more of a necessity in the business world, and now they are a necessity for the administration of the Government business and are largely so used, and the work accomplished by these machines is different from that of cash registers. For instance, an adding machine will take the place of 25 men and women. The cash register does not take the place of anybody. It simply serves to keep a record of sales and a check on the clerks.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be recognized in opposition to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I can not agree with the chairman of the committee in his differentiation that the cash register is not a labor-saving device and should bear a tax while the adding machines and duplicating machines should not. I might favor a tax on cash registers in the view that the cash register is virtually controlled by a monopoly. But so are the adding machines controlled by a monopoly. The price is fixed, and they are both of the same character, labor-saving devices. The cash register is an adding machine, it registers the sales and relieves the proprietor of clerical work. I can not understand why the committee should relieve adding machines and duplicating machines, except that they wish to give one manufacturer a benefit over another. This is an opportunity where we can raise revenue. I will ask the chairman how much was estimated could be raised by a tax on duplicating and adding machines.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have not the figures just now.

Mr. STAFFORD. We all know that adding machines are expensive. The lowest price of the Burroughs machine is $275, and they run up to $500 or $600. I am informed that there is a harmonious agreement as to price between the respective manufacturers of adding machines.

Mr. KITCHIN. Since the gentleman asked the question the Clerk has given me the expert's estimate of the amount of revenue that is estimated to be received from the tax on duplicating machines, adding machines, and cash registers, and it is as follows: On duplicating machines, $500,000; adding machines, $500,000; and cash registers, $2,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. This tax would be paid because every person who needs a duplicating or an adding machine would pay the higher price. Any person who needs a cash register will pay a high tax. It is a means of raising a million dollars of revenue. The President's order forbidding the manufacture of near beer deprives the Treasury of $24,000,000 which could have been obtained by permitting 25,000,000 bushels of barley to be used, two-thirds of which would have been returned to the farmer in the form of feed. The Treasury having lost this $24,000,000 in revenue, you should not diminish the objects of taxation, but rather retain and increase them. The manufacturers will be relieved, by lifting this tax, from paying a part of this burden. It would have to be assumed, in a measure, by the manufacturer, and could not be passed on entirely to the purchaser by reason of the present high price and the diminishing and limited number of purchasers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KITCHIN) there were—ayes 125, noes 7.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer another committee amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 129, line 20, strike out the word "and"; line 22, strike out the period and insert a semicolon and the word "and"; after line 22, insert a paragraph, as follows:

"(26) Toilet soaps and powders, 10 per cent," and a period.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, that should read "toilet soaps and soap powders," and I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be so modified.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be modified as indicated.

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, does not the gentleman think that is a rather high tax on toilet soaps?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; and I think it is better to put it on the manufacturer. It is pretty high in the bill for ordinary soaps. There was no way for the department to distinguish between toilet soaps and the ordinary soaps that everybody uses in the household.

Mr. DYER. The tax is now 2 per cent, and this increases it to 10 per cent.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. We have increased it just as we have the others, but we have taken toilet soaps and soap powders out of a still higher rate in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, ought not that amendment to be further modified by striking out "(26)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(25)"?

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is correct about that, and I ask that the Clerk be permitted to so further modify the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will further modify the amendment as indicated.

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN severally offered the following amendments, which were severally reported and severally agreed to:

Page 131, line 15, after the word "sold," insert the words "on or after such date."

Page 133, line 2, after the word "slippers" and the comma, insert the following: "not including shoes or appliances made to order for any person having a crippled or deformed foot or ankle."

Page 133, line 21, strike out "(22) or (23)" and insert "(20) or (21)."

Page 133, line 23, after the word "vendor," insert "at the time of the sale."

Page 135, line 9, after the word "sold," insert "on or after such date"; line 10, after the word "vendor," insert the words "at the time of the sale."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina a question. Will he be good enough to explain why the words "at the time of the sale" are inserted?

Mr. KITCHIN. Suppose something is sold on credit. It might not be paid for for 10 or 12 months, but the tax ought to be assessed at the time the sale is made.

Mr. KITCHIN severally offered the following amendments, which were severally reported and severally agreed to:

Page 135, line 23, after the word "sold" insert "on or after such date."

Page 136, line 2, strike out the words "toilet soaps and powders" and insert in lieu thereof the words "toilet powders (other than soap powders)."

Page 137, line 6, after the word "purchaser," and before the comma, insert "at the time of the sale."

Page 143, strike out lines 6 to 11, inclusive, and in lines 12 strike out "(13)" and insert "(12)."

Page 144, strike out lines 6 to 10, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(13) Persons engaged in any trade, business, or profession, whose gross receipts therefrom for the preceding year ending June 30 exceed $2,500 shall pay $10. If such person is a wholesaler he shall pay $5 additional."

Page 144, line 13, strike out the word "sections" and insert "section 1000," and before the figures "1007" insert the word "or," and strike out the word "proprietors" and insert the word "persons."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 144, line 17, after the words "mixed flour" insert the following: "Provided, That sections 35 to 49, inclusive, of the act of June 13, 1898, entitled 'An act to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, and for other purposes,' as amended by the act of March 2, 1901, and as further amended by the act of April 12, 1902, be, and the same are hereby, suspended for and during the period of the existing state of war between the United States and Germany, and until the fact and date of determination of said war shall have been ascertained and proclaimed by the President of the United States."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment. It is not germane to the bill and tends to reduce the revenue rather than to increase the revenue. I make the point of order.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Will the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I reserve it.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Suppose we pass this over until the other matter is disposed of.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I shall make the point of order whenever the matter is reintroduced.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Illinois asked to pass it over until a later time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I prefer the gentleman should go on and make his statement now.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Well, the gentleman reserves the point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do so that the gentleman can make his statement.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, the object of this committee amendment is to repeal for the period of this war the laws which are known as the "mixed-flour" laws. In 1898 Congress passed the Spanish-American War tax. It has been amended once or twice, first in 1901 and again in 1902. This is the last vestige remaining of the Spanish-American War tax. The remainder of the Spanish-American War tax act was repealed in 1902. The mixed-flour act of 1898 provides for a tax upon every barrel of mixed flour of 4 cents and provides also for an occupation tax of $12 per year to be paid by any person engaging in the business of grinding or mixing or packing mixed flour. This law has been in force until the present time. Last month, at the request of the President of the United States, Mr. Hoover, our Food Administrator, participated in Paris in conferences between the food administrators of all the allied nations and as a result of that conference it was determined by the food administrators of the allied nations to establish a standard flour for the nations engaged in the war with Germany to consist of 80 per cent of pure wheat flour and 20 per cent of substitutes in order that during the continuance of this war the nations of the world and the armies engaged in this awful war might have bread. The allied nations propose to enforce that agreement. In the opinion of Mr. Hoover and his assistants, before the international agreement which provides a method by which the nations of the world shall eat at the same table, before that can be carried out in this country, it is necessary to repeal the mixed-flour act of 1898 with its burdensome requirements, with its occupation tax, with its moonshine-whisky requirements, which requires that stamps shall be affixed to packages so that the stamps can be broken when packages are opened. In 1898 we had 116 mixers paying a revenue to the Government of $3,000 per year, much less than the amount of money required to enforce the law. At the present time there are more mixers, I am not advised this morning as to the number, but at the present time a larger revenue is derived from that source than has ever been derived before, but not enough, as I understand it, to pay the expenses of enforcing the law. The Internal Revenue Department have advised three times in the past the repeal of this law. The Internal Revenue Department, in a statement I have here, say that this law contributes nothing toward the purity of flour nor has it contributed toward the purity of flour, that the pure-food laws of 1906 accomplish that result in the matter of flour as they do in the matter of all other foodstuffs, and so in the interest of this international purpose, in order to enable these millers, and most of them as I understand it now want to engage in the mixing of flour——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. In just a moment. In order to enable them to mix flour without these taxes this legislation is asked. Now they will be asked to do it anyway. If the Food Administrator has the power he will compel them to do it and the question presented here is whether we want to add to the cost of bread or not, add to the difficulties of flour mixing in this country or not by maintaining in force during the period of this war the stamp laws of 1898, and I have here a letter from Mr. Hoover on the subject, which I send to the Clerk and ask to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES FOOD ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, 13 September, 1918.

Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY,
Ways and Means Committee,
House of Representativse, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. RAINEY: I inclose herewith an amendment that I would like to suggest to the revenue act providing for the suspension of the mixed-flour laws during the period of the war. You will recollect that this is a tax measure, and, while it yields practically no result from taxation, from a revenue point of view, it is seriously cumbering the international food program in this emergency, in that, at the recent conference of the food administrators of all the allied countries, in which the food resources of all countries were carefully considered, it was decided that it would be necessary to mix 20 per cent of other cereal flours with the wheat flour during the coming year, and probably for the duration of the war, if we are to provide an ample bread supply and enable ourselves to carry over any resources as against the possible deficiencies in next year's harvest. I entered these conferences with the instructions of the President that it was the duty of all those fighting against Germany to eat at a common table, and it appears to us that it is only a portion of our national duty that our peoples should undertake the same loaf as that provided in the allied countries. Furthermore, our people are anxious to participate with the allies in such sacrifices as are necessary to win the war. You will recognize that a wheat bread made with a mixture of some 20 per cent of other cereals is a wholly nutritious and palatable loaf. In allied countries they compel the mixture of cereals in the flour, and, whereas our transportation conditions do not make it desirable for us to compel this issue, we could provide to a large portion of our population a mixed flour of this character. Under the existing law it is practically impossible to secure such a mixture, as the detailed requirements under the act are such that no miller can in principle comply with the tax requirements without such expense as to make the operation prohibitive.

At the present moment we are compelled to rely upon the voluntary action of the individual consumer to mix these flours for bread making. Not only does it impose difficulties in household management but, while the great majority will follow to the best of their ability, many will not comply, and, in any event, it imposes an unnecessary difficulty on the householder. As to the actual character of the mixture of different flours, this can be provided by regulations under the food act so that anything in the nature of adulteration can be prevented.

I am extremely anxious that the committee should entertain this matter favorably, as it not only will result in great practical conservation but also will enable us to carry out in practical good faith the obligations that we have entered upon. This is entirely for the period of the war and simply as a necessary war measure, and it seems to me, therefore, that all of the technical disputes over this question can be suspended in the face of national necessity.

Yours, faithfully, HERBERT HOOVER.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. NORTON. Is it not a fact that the existing law does not prohibit the mixing of flour, but that it merely requires when flour is mixed or adulterated that it be branded and that stamps be placed upon the barrel or the sack giving the proportion of flour and the proportion of adulteration or mixture?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. No; the gentleman has not stated the law correctly. Anybody can mix flour and put it on the market and sell it. Anybody can mix flour in their homes, but——

Mr. NORTON. Mix it in a mill——

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. But when a miller or mixer or packer mixes flour for commercial purposes he must pay an occupation tax of $12 a year before he can do it.

Mr. NORTON. And 4 cents a barrel?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. And in addition to that he must pay a tax of 4 cents a barrel, and a stamp must be affixed to the package containing it, and then the mixed-flour law carries into the proposition all the provisions which seek to prevent the manufacture of moonshine whisky, in the matter of destruction of containers, and the keeping of books, and all that sort of thing; and as a result millers of the country and mixers and packers declined before the war to engage in this expensive and annoying method of doing business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NORTON. And is it not a fact that the investigations which were held before the committee a few years ago on this question showed that the gist of the objection of the millers and corn producers to this law was the fact that the law required they should state on the package what the adulterants or mixtures were?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. No; not at all. The law requires that you shall state on the package or rather brand on the package the words "mixed flour," and that is all, and they must state under the words "mixed flour," "wheat flour and corn flour," or whatever other ground cereal was mixed with wheat flour.

Mr. NORTON. And you propose by your amendment to repeal that law, do you not?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Yes; that is the amendment that is suggested by the Food Administrator, in order to carry out the policy that has been agreed upon by all the nations engaged in this war with Germany in order to produce a standard loaf. The objection to the repeal of this law heretofore has always been from the northwestern millers, who reach down through the States even into the corn country, and who are opposed to it because there is no corn up there, and that is the fight that is at the bottom of all of it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry? In the first place, Minnesota is the third or fourth in the production of corn. But my inquiry is this: If the gentleman's amendment prevails, will it not enable millers anywhere, Northwest or any other section, to mix wheat flour with cornmeal flour, buckwheat flour, or any other kind of flour they want to mix with it, and sell it to the public, and the public will not know how much wheat flour or buckwheat flour or other flour is in it, but think they are buying wheat flour?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Nothing of the kind. Mr. Hoover's statement this morning——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Hoover's statement has no weight with me. I have listened to it carefully, and I am of the opinion that he is treating of a subject of which he knows practically nothing.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I will state for Mr. Hoover that as soon as he was appointed Food Administrator I consulted with him about this very question, and he told me as food administrator in Belgium the first thing he did was to require the mixing of flour in the proportions of 80 per cent wheat and 20 per cent corn flour, or some other substance. He knows more about the subject than any other man in this world.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Has the gentleman ever seen any of that bread that they are eating in Belgium?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. You are eating it every day. Every loaf of bread you buy in this town at a bakery is made in that way.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have been in Belgium and eaten it, and most of it is not fit for a dog to eat. That bread is black, unwholesome, and a thousand more things might be said of it.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. The gentleman really does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I may not.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. You can not buy a loaf of Corby's bread or any other bread in this town that does not contain 20 per cent of other products than wheat.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am speaking of the English bread and the French bread. I am not speaking of Corby's bread. I am comparing the two.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. There is no baker in this country to-day who manufactures and puts on the market a loaf of bread that does not contain 20 per cent of substitutes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I did not deny that.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. You deny that it is palatable bread. But you eat it every day.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The difference between the Belgian bread and the mixture we are eating in this country is as wide as the difference between the poles.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I understand that over there they are using more substitutes than they are here.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GOOD. I was just going to say that I saw a demonstration with regard to bread that was made with a mixture of corn and wheat flour. I could not detect any difference between the pure wheat-bread flour and the flour that was made with an admixture of corn flour. By a great many it is claimed to be a superior bread when a small amount of corn flour is placed in it. And when it is sold the admixture is stamped right on the package under the pure-food laws. If there is any mixture, that fact is known to everybody who buys the flour, because it necessarily must be stamped on the sack itself. The only thing, as I understand the gentleman's amendment, is that it repeals that provision of law which requires the manufacturer who does comply with the food laws to mix a little corn flour with the wheat flour, and thereby conserves the wheat, but he would be relieved from paying the tax of 4 cents a barrel on the flour?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Yes. And in addition——

Mr. GOOD. It is a foolish proposition, and the tax law ought to be repealed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. In addition to that, at the present moment throughout the United States bakeries and housewives are being advised as a matter of patriotic duty to mix flour with 20 per cent of substitutes and 80 per cent of wheat flour. And those that are patriotic, those who believe in winning this war, who believe that the conservation of food is necessary in order to do it, especially the conservation of bread, are agreeing to the spirit of those suggestions on the part of the Food Administrator, and are doing it, and the Food Administrator simply wants now to make it easier for millers and for mixers to be patriotic and to comply with his suggestions, and avoid the payment of these taxes that do not yield any revenue. And those of you who eat your lunch to-day in the restaurant under this room will eat white bread, and it will be white bread composed of 80 per cent of flour and 20 per cent of substitutes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. And if this restaurant is not patriotic the country ought to know it.

Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Under the operation of the gentleman's amendment will the public be advised as to the character of flour it is buying?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the package be branded?

Mr. FOSTER. They are advised now.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. They are advised now, and under this amendment they will be advised.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will it be such an advice as the official stamping or branding of the package to indicate the character of the contents?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. It will be better advice than they are getting now.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I want to know specifically if we are going to buy a thing in the market as it really is or leave it to the discretion of the miller to tell somebody what he says it is.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. The statement of Mr. Hoover's representative to the committee this morning was that the marking and branding will be carried right on to the packages that reach the ultimate consumer, and that the ultimate consumer will know exactly what he is buying and exactly how much wheat flour there is in it, and exactly the percentage of other substances and what they are. He has the authority to do that under the power we have already given to him. He is going to do it anyway, gentlemen, whether you repeal this tax or not. Those regulations will be enforced in this country, and we will win this war in spite of the millers of Minnesota.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, are we discussing the point of order? I object to a discussion of the merits of the amendment now, except on the point of order. It is the point of order that is before the House.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. No point of order has been made yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has not yet been made.

Mr. FORDNEY. I want to discuss it if it is made.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has not been made.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I have not yielded the floor. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY. Is it not a fact that under the law requiring the mixing of flour this tax is now already placed on the wheat producer of the country as well as on the consumer?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Yes. It is absolutely a burden on the wheat producers, the consumer, and upon everybody, and an obstruction in the way of winning the war.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then, the consuming public will not be deceived under your amendment as to the adulteration? Do I understand you to say that the consuming public will not be deceived by this adulteration which you propose to authorize to be put on them, but that they will be advised in a way that they can not help seeing it as to the percentage of the component parts in the package?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Certainly. That is the intention of the Food Administration.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What I wanted to learn definitely and clearly—because I understood the gentleman in reply to a question, to say something that I hoped was not the case and hoped would not prevail—I understood the gentleman to say that his amendment would repeal that part of the existing law which compels the publication of the adulteration in percentage and in nature, too. Some gentleman asked that question.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. No. The Food Administrator, under the powers which we have given him, has the right to add all these requirements, and he has the right to require this marking much more elaborately than the pure-food law now provides for, and his representative assures me that it will be done.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is proposed to adulterate all flour at the mills?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. No; it is not proposed to do that. It is proposed to induce millers to mix flours—patriotic millers—if it can be done, and it is proposed, in order to give them an inducement for mixing it, to remove these burdensome requirements.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then, do you not believe that the family that uses a correct percentage of corn meal, aside from any percentage of it in this mixed stuff, will not be deceived in the matter?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. There will be nothing in the regulations or in the repeal of this law that would prevent the use of corn meal.

Mr. SLAYDEN. They mix corn meal with the wheat flour now.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. No. It can not be done. Corn meal and corn flour are different propositions. Until this war started we had no corn flour. We had corn meal. We now have both wheat flour and corn flour. In making corn flour the corn kernel with the outer skin removed is removed, and what remains is ground into corn flour, and that is what is mixed with wheat flour.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to disturb this academic pure-food conversation that is going on, but it seems to me it is useless to discuss the merits of this matter until we determine whether or not it is going to be considered and whether the rules of the committee permit it to be considered. I suggest that the point of order be discussed and that the Chair decide that point of order.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. No point of order has been made.

The CHAIRMAN. No point of order has yet been made.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes a point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My point of order, in the first place, is that this is not germane to the bill. In the second place, I make the point of order that no reservation was made to permit the introduction of this amendment at a particular place, and the gentleman has lost his day in court. I am willing to leave this question to be decided on its merits, but I make that point of order on it.

The CHAIRMAN. Has that section of the bill been passed?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. No reservation was made to return to it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Then that disposes of it.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I thought we were to return for the consideration of all the committee amendments. I think that anybody who will make that kind of a point of order would give me ground for objecting to any return to any place in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois can object to returning to anything for which specific provision has not been made, and the Chair will at once sustain it. The reason why the Chair asked whether there was a special reservation to return to this matter was that if there was no reservation to return to it, how can we get back to it when we have passed it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to meeting the gentleman on the merits of this question. But it is an old story, that was thrashed out in the Committee on Ways and Means years ago. It involves the health of the people of the United States as well as of the people abroad. It involves the question of mixing flour with barytes, of mixing ground marble and all sorts of deleterious substances with flour, to grind out the lives of the poor children in the land who are compelled to eat this stuff.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. There never was a more absurd, nonsensical statement made on this floor.

The CHAIRMAN. This matter can be very simply disposed of when we get at the facts. The Chair asked if there was any agreement in committee to return to this section for the purpose of amendment. It was stated from the floor that there was not. Of course, if that is true, that disposes of it at once.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I make that point—there was no agreement.

The CHAIRMAN. The point has been made, and the Chair sustained it. The Clerk at the desk, however, says that a memorandum shows that there was an agreement to return to this section for amendment. If that is the fact, of course we are here properly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am willing to leave it to the gentleman from Illinois to say whether or not he made a reservation at the time this paragraph was read to introduce this or any other amendment.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I did not make any reservation, but if anybody else did I want to take advantage of it.

The CHAIRMAN. If it was made by anybody else, it was in respect to that particular amendment.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I will state to the gentleman that I did not make the reservation, because the gentleman knows that for days we have been waiting for Mr. Hoover's representative to come before the committee to take this matter up; and the gentleman knew that we proposed to offer this amendment on the floor of the House, and it is bad faith on the gentleman's part to make that point of order at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois states that he did not reserve the right to return to this paragraph for the purpose of offering an amendment, and on that statement the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to state, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], that, while I knew he intended to bring this matter up, I advised him that I would oppose it when he did bring it up. I was unfortunate in not being at the committee meeting this morning, but I am pleased to say I was on the floor when he brought it up and was able to make the point of order.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I want to give notice that as soon as we resume the reading of the bill I will reintroduce this amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And I give notice that I shall make the point of order.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday I offered an amendment on page 139, with the understanding that we would recur to it this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The first thing this morning is the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the agreement of yesterday, which was modified this morning by the unanimous consent granted on the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], and the matters covered by the unanimous consent having been disposed of, the first thing now in order is the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask that that amendment be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Page 128, line 24, after the word "centum" insert the words "and cotton used therein, $3 per bale."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] reserved a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. CRISP. I reserved a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is reserved.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, at the outset I wish to congratulate my Democratic brethren upon the full attendance on their side of the House this morning. If it had been any other than a cotton proposition, perhaps we would not have been so favored, but I wish my Democratic brethren to understand that there is nothing personal in the amendment that I have offered or in those that I expect to offer if this one carries. In fact, as showing the spirit of cordiality that prevails, I want to read at this time a message that was just handed to me by one of the pages, which I assume came in good faith from the outside.

HON. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: Can you be prevailed upon to deliver the principal address at the annual banquet of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange on the evening of October 1?

Respectfully, J. W. JOHNSON.

[Laughter.]

I do not know whether that invitation was indited by my good friend, Mr. GARNER, of Texas, or by my other good friend, Mr. BURNETT, of Alabama, or by my equally good friend, Judge CRISP, of Georgia; but I wish to say to them, as a committee appointed to tender this invitation, that I thoroughly appreciate the spirit in which it came, accept it in the same spirit, and will attend the banquet if I find my engagements will permit me to do so. [Laughter.] And should I attend this banquet, it will give me great pleasure to say what I intend to say now as briefly as possible, which is that we are under the necessity, as the representatives of the people, of raising the enormous sum of $8,000,000,000 by taxation, and that we were charged by the President, who addressed us from this rostrum, and subsequently by his Secretary of the Treasury, to get this money for the purposes of the war. The President indicated that taxes must be levied in substantially the proportion of one-third of the total amount, and that they should be equitably and generally distributed; and he also said that he believed that if they were equitably distributed the people would pay them cheerfully.

I approach the subject, then, in the same spirit in which the President approached it, with a view of getting this $8,000,000,000 by equitable taxation.

Some gentlemen have thought that there is something sectional in a discussion of the cotton question. I wish every Representative from a Southern State with whom I have had the pleasure of being acquainted for many years to understand that I have no prejudice in this matter; that I have no desire to point out cotton and make it conspicuous as a nontax payer. I glory in cotton, as does every other true American. I am glad it is an American monopoly. I regret when the cotton crop tends toward failure, and I glory when the cotton crop rises and is profitable. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman is aware of the fact, however, that out of the 48 States there are only 11 States that produce cotton to any great extent.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Substantially so.

Mr. GARNER. Therefore, when you do levy a tax on cotton, you levy a tax that is not distributed throughout the entire country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; that may be true.

Mr. GARNER. Then, the gentleman ought not to say that he is trying to avoid sectionalism, because the very nature of the tax makes it sectional.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I accept the gentleman's statement.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The same thing is true of wheat and of mineral products.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman let me make my speech? I have only five minutes. I accept the gentleman's statement in good faith, and answer him in this way: That if he claims that because I am asking cotton to pay a share of the war expenses I am sectional, then I might ask him, with equal propriety, why 70 per cent of all the money raised by taxation is raised in 10 States of the Union, and substantially half of it in only 3 States? [Applause.]

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman permit a question there?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. The articles are sent back to those States and it is levied on things in every State only because of the wealth that is congregated there.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We use cotton in every State, and the farther it gets from the cotton field the more we pay for it, so that the gentleman's argument is answered in the distribution of cotton. The man does an injustice to the representative of any State who, because he is faced with raising $8,000,000,000, an unheard of amount, suggests that the tax that is to be raised shall be equitably distributed. I have shown recently that a very few people of this country were bearing the great burden of taxation, and that millions and millions of people of the country were paying no income tax at all.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman admit that it would be just as just to tax corn as to tax cotton?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I admit that; if we need it for winning the war.

Mr. HARDY. Then, why did not the gentleman include corn in his amendment?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I preferred to let the gentleman from Texas do that after we have thrashed out the matter of cotton.

Mr. HARDY. Did not the gentleman offer his amendment as to cotton merely because cotton is confined to a small section and corn to a large section?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I suggest that it is more because the gentlemen from southern States expected the gentleman from Pennsylvania to offer a cotton amendment.

Mr. HARDY. Why did the gentleman offer an amendment to tax cotton that comes from only one section and not include corn that comes from all sections?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have answered that. If the gentleman will point to anything that stands in the same relation as cotton, I will stand with the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY. I have suggested corn.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If corn is profiteering, if coal or any other raw material is profiteering, I assume they should pay taxes; also cotton, if it is profiteering.

Now, I have not the time in 10 minutes to go into this fully. What I want is to get a vote on this important question. If gentlemen want to, let them vote it down. I have raised it because I thought it a matter of duty. I have told gentlemen that the bulk of taxes are paid by very few people in a very few States. A great number of States pay relatively small taxes. The great mass of the people pay relatively small taxes. My State happens to be one that is heavily taxed. The gentleman from Alabama suggested that we ought to tax steel. If they are going to make that proposition, well and good.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HEFLIN. I did not make the suggestion to tax steel. I said the gentleman invited such tax. I do not think we ought to tax such products.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has changed his notes a little bit on that. He did not say that on the floor, but he wrote it into his speech.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is my position on it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to follow the gentleman up on that, because the gentleman speaks eloquently for cotton. I would like to see the gentleman propose a tax on iron ore; that is the beginning of steel. The gentleman wrote that into his speech. He was not satisfied with his speech as made orally, but wrote the suggestion into his speech, as I observed on reading it this morning.

Mr. HEFLIN. Why does not the gentleman offer the tax on steel himself?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Because I am accepting the gentleman's challenge and calling his bluff.

Mr. HEFLIN. The cotton is in my section and the steel in yours.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will follow out his suggestion to tax iron ore, I may stand with the gentleman, although that will tax Alabama's other industries besides cotton. Will the gentleman make good?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am opposed to a tax of that sort.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can see the hematite ore mine owners—the owners of the Black Warrior region—I can see those gentlemen down there paying a compliment to the gentleman from Alabama when he offers an amendment to tax iron ore, and I challenge the gentleman from Alabama to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now, that challenge stands in the record. I have said in other addresses that wherever iron and steel are manufactured or sold there the taxes are heaviest. There is where you get the money to run the Government. You do not get it from the raw materials, because there has been a dread of touching the raw materials and imposing consumption taxes, even in times of war.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. That is because of the fact that the income from all of the public utilities in my district go to the places where they are owned.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They come to the East for capital.

Mr. BLANTON. Our waterworks and electric lights are all owned by people in the North, and the income goes to the people of the North to be taxed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Sometimes taxes are levied heavily on northern capital by the Southern States to which it goes. The gentleman knows very well that when capital from the North goes into the State of Texas the legislature has a grip on that situation.

Mr. BLANTON. But it makes the people bear the burden whenever the burden is levied.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the statistics show that the great burden of the levy is not in the State of Texas, whether northern capital goes into that State or not; it remains in the State of New York. Gentlemen complain about proposals to tax cotton upon the ground that it is unpatriotic to do so. Why? Cotton has been profitable. Grant that the Texas cotton crops have met with misfortune this year. Grant that an extraordinary drought has prevailed in that country, which I sincerely and deeply regret. Grant that some of the other States perhaps have not been doing so well this year as they had expected, although reports differ. Cotton fluctuates in price. It seems to be the victim of speculators. Cotton for some reason or other, because it is not taxed, or because a price is not fixed, seems to be exceptionally timid in the market—I mean from the financial point of view—and I sympathize with it. But I question sometimes whether it would not stabilize cotton if a tax were put upon it so that it could be located, so that a little bit of responsibility could be fixed upon it.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have not very much time.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I am going to ask but one question. The gentleman made the statement that cotton is profitable. Will the gentleman tell me to what extent it has been profitable since the outbreak of the war?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will answer the gentleman's question by asking him a question. The gentleman is a banker and I will ask him to state whether he does not have more money in his bank at Charlotte, S. C., to-day, than he had before the European war.

Mr. RAGSDALE. The gentleman is almost as mixed in his facts as he is in his geography. In the first place, Charlotte is not in the State of South Carolina, and in the next place, I do not own a bank there.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I said the gentleman is a banker. And I will amend Charlotte by inserting Florence. And, withdrawing the personal application of it, I will put my question this way: Is it not true that the banks in the gentleman's State have more money on deposit now than ever before?

Mr. RAGSDALE. And I will state to the gentleman that the sale of cotton has not begun in South Carolina, and the reason we have more money is because of the tobacco crops and the price of tobacco. Tobacco is higher now than it has been since the Civil War. For the past four or five years in many instances we have not got back even the cost of planting the cotton. I have been a personal sufferer myself in the planting of cotton, and I have not been able to get transportation in the past year to ship cotton away, and in some of the grades I can not get a bid anywhere in the United States from any manufacturer or cotton dealer on any of the low grades.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I sympathize with the gentleman in his cotton troubles, and again ask him whether the banks in his State do not have more money on deposit now than before the war?

Mr. RAGSDALE. And I say that that is to be attributed not to the sale of cotton but because of the sale of tobacco.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not attacking cotton. Let me ask the gentleman if liberty bonds have not been selling freely in his State?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Yes; they have; and the people of South Carolina have also made a good record upon the field of battle and everywhere else that calls for patriotism.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is just what I expected of South Carolina, and what I would expect of every loyal State of the Union, and there are no disloyal States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I must ask that my time be extended for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And I venture to say when it comes to service on the field of battle that no one State is going to chide another State.

They are all doing splendidly, and the cotton States are doing their share.

I am glad to have the gentleman's admission that the banks of South Carolina, in common with the other banks of the 13 States referred to by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], are doing better this year than they did before the war. That is good, and I am glad to have it so, and the question arises whether the people, being more prosperous than they were before the war, should not be able to pay a little bit of the burden of taxation that is put on other commodities than cotton. Gentlemen seem to think that cotton is sacro sanct. I am willing to put a halo around it, I want to glorfy it, but cotton has not always been free from taxation. Cotton was once taxed, much more heavily taxed, than is proposed in this amendment. Away back in the beginning of this Government, when cotton was coming on to amount to something in the world of production, our forefathers provided a tariff tax on cotton in order to protect a growing industry, an infant industry, and they kept that duty on at 3 cents a pound to prevent any foreign cotton from coming into the United States all the way from 1789 to 1866. The producers got the benefit of a 3-cents-per-pound tax upon cotton during all of those years and built up a wonderful industry. We may call it an American monopoly, and we may all be proud of it. It went on the free list only in 1883; it has been on the free list since under both Republican and Democratic administrations, but it was directly taxed during the Civil War. It was taxed in the hands of the producer then at the rate of 3 cents a pound, which is much higher than is now proposed, when we are now faced with the greatest war in history.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will have to get me more time.

Mr. HOWARD. I just want to say that while it was taxed, the constitutionality of that tax was passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States, and it was affirmed only by operation of law, because the bench was evenly divided upon the question; it stood 4 to 4.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the Supreme Court divided upon it, then it seems to have been a question, like the tax on bonds, that might properly be raised to-day, when we need the money for the war.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will the gentleman yield just a moment?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Does not the gentleman know that in the income-tax cases the Supreme Court flatly decided that any direct tax had to be levied by the rule of apportionment according to the population?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I shall not dispute a Supreme Court decision with the gentleman, who is a good lawyer. I would want to ask the gentleman whether he thinks—because that is the question after all—whether he thinks and intends to vote, while we tax other commodities throughout the United States for the purpose of the war, that cotton shall, in this crisis, continue to be free?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Does the pending bill propose to tax any great staple other than cotton, such as steel, iron ore, coal, corn, wheat——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That question was raised by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] and eloquently defended by him while the gentleman was in the rear of the hall.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Does the pending bill propose to tax any other staple at all?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, yes.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Any great staple?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, it taxes quite a number of articles, some of which were enumerated this morning. If the gentleman will take up the bill he will find there are many articles separately taxed.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. STEVENSON. I understood the gentleman to say that he proposes not to tax the producer but, I suppose, the consumer. Is that his construction of what this tax amounts to?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In time of war when we need $8,000,000,000 I would go after the money wherever it was and get it—equitably, of course. That is the attitude of the President of the United States, crudely stated.

Mr. STEVENSON. Does the gentleman concede his tax is to be one on the consumer?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The point I make is that we should not raise all this war revenue exclusively from one source, that we should be generous to the rest of the people of the United States and invite them to come in and pay a little.

Mr. STEVENSON. There is another statement I understood the gentleman to make, and that was that we had a monopoly in this country for the last——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may proceed for 10 minutes. I want to find out what he is driving at.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania has another amendment that directly taxes cotton by the bale.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I have such an amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. Why can not we have an agreement that the committee shall consider both of those and debate them at the same time without going through the same debate again, as it looks like we would do?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] made a point of order against this amendment and I am proceeding under that reservation of that point. I am willing to quit in five minutes.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will quit in five minutes if gentlemen would not interrupt me, because I think it is fair——

Mr. KITCHIN. Can not we limit debate on this question now to 15 minutes?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So far as I am concerned, yes.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, if I may have the gentleman's attention for a moment, while I am very much opposed to this amendment and think it not right to be enacted, still I never shall argue to the House or to the Chair a point of order that I myself do not believe is good. I never shall attempt to mislead the House, and I do not believe the point of order is good against the pending amendment, and therefore I am going to withdraw the reservation. I do think the point of order is good against the main proposition, and shall urge it, but as against this I do not think so, and I never shall try to get the House to agree to something I do not believe is right. Therefore, I withdraw my point of order on this amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WINGO). The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] has made a unanimous-consent request that debate on this amendment shall end in how much time?

Mr. KITCHIN. I should say in 12 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that debate upon the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close in 12 minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquery.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That applies simply to this original amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, not to his other amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment to the pending paragraph and all amendments to the pending amendment. That does not apply to the original proposition, which the Chair understands the gentleman intends to offer later on. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And now may I have the attention of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]?

The CHAIRMAN. One moment. How is this 12 minutes to be controlled?

Mr. KITCHIN. Five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] and five to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection—and it will be considered as ordered—5 of the minutes out of the 12 shall go to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and 5 to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask the attention of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]. The gentleman has made a strong and fair statement. Like him, I want to facilitate business, and because of his statement make this announcement. I shall not offer any other amendment until we come to the flat-tax amendment. I think it would be in order to offer it after this, and if beaten I shall not prolong this discussion by offering it on other paragraphs.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has the gentleman any reliable information as to the number of bales of cotton consumed annually in the manufacture of tapestry in the United States to which the gentleman's amendment applies?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman can not estimate how much revenue his amendment would raise if adopted?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; I will be frank with the gentleman and say I offered the amendment at this point only because cotton enters into tapestry. That is where an amendment is in order under the rules.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Is there any more justification for taxing cotton than for taxing corn, wheat, or any other commodity?

Mr. MOORE of Pensylvania. I have answered that, if the gentleman pleases. I said if there was profiteering in cotton or corn or wheat or any other commodity it should be taxed, or if a crisis arose where we had to have the money it would not be inequitable to tax such products along with other commodities offered for sale.

Mr. OSBORNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield for a question.

Mr. OSBORNE. The question I would propound to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is one that I put because I want the information. Do not the growers of cotton, as well as those of corn and wheat and other agricultural products, now pay their taxes in the form of income tax that we are imposing by this law?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Of course, they do, when found. If the gentleman had listened to my speech the other day he would have learned that while there are 6,000,000 farmers in the United States, including cotton growers, only 14,000 of them pa'd any income tax.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. Two minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then I will have to decline to yield. I can not yield to gentlemen any further.

I have received complaints from gentlemen in the cotton-manufacturing business about the price of yarn. They say there is profiteering in yarn. I will read one paragraph from a letter which is before me, which tends to illustrate why gentlemen complain:

> In other words, the advance in the allowance for spinning, overhead, and profit is 385 per cent, which in a measure explains the phenomenal profits which were returned last year by all the southern cotton mills, for during the past four years I am authoritatively advised that the wages of the southern cotton-mill operatives have been advanced but 50 per cent.

This phase of the cotton question was brought to the attention of the Federal Trade Commission by my colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULD]. I have not time to read the whole of the letter which the commission wrote to him in regard to this profiteering situation in cotton, a situation which the President may have had in mind when he wrote his famous letter to Mr. Harris during his senatorial campaign in Georgia a few weeks ago. But here is a part of what the Federal Trade Commission says:

> The commission has not undertaken a general investigation of the cotton-goods industry, and in view of the enormous amount of work involved in the requests above noted it could not with its limited personnel undertake such an investigation without crippling and unduly delaying the urgent work that has a direct bearing upon matters intimately touching the conduct of the war. The commission has adopted the policy of making its service to the various war agencies paramount, and it is believed you will appreciate the wisdom of this policy.
> It is believed that the work of the commission for the War Industries Board and the War and the Navy Departments in connection with the cotton textile industry will result in more satisfactory conditions. The matters as to combinations among yarn spinners and others are under separate investigation by the commission, and if the evils complained of are not measurably remedied by the results of the investigation now being made, such remedy as is within the powers of the commission will be applied.

Apparently the Federal Trade Commission has time to investigate the Beef Trust, but it has no time to investigate the Cotton Trust. That is a matter worth considering. It may have some bearing on what gentlemen have said on the floor of the House in reference to speculation in cotton. It is known that we are paying the highest price for cotton commodities. If the cotton grower is not getting his share, we may find it if we put a check on the bale and know where the money is going.

I want to quote briefly from the report of the Director of the Census in regard to the cotton crop of 1917:

> The crop of 1917, according to the returns of the ginners, amounted to 11,248,242 running bales, counting round as half bales, equivalent to 11,302,375 bales of 500 pounds gross weight. With one exception, it was the smallest crop produced since 1909; that of 1915 amounting to only 11,068,173 bales. Compared with the crop of 1916, there was a falling off in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Missouri, North Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia; and an increase in Arizona, California, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, Oklahoma, and South Carolina. The most notable increase was in Louisiana, where the production was 629,719 bales, the largest for any year since 1907.

There were more than 11,000,000 bales in 1917 that did not pay one cent of tax toward this great world war. The tax of $3, as proposed by my amendment, would bring $33,000,000 of revenue, and would help to solve the problems of the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury at this time. It would help to win the war. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, it takes a gigantic intellect to develop an economic proposition like this. Who ever heard of taxing agricultural crops? But it is entirely in harmony with the position just taken by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] when by the interposition of a point of order—in bad faith, as I claim, under the circumstances—he has attempted to provide more expensive bread for the people of his district.

It will not be long before we commence recessing, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be making speeches in his district telling what a glorious, magnificent supporter of the war policies of this administration he has been; and yet, by refusing an opportunity to this House to vote on the merits of this administration war proposition, by resorting to a technical point of order, he obeys the orders of the profiteering millers of his district and provides, as far as he can, more expensive bread for the people who live in his district.

Why, the gentleman from Pennsylvania takes orders. He does not represent the consumers of his district. He represents that district in Pennsylvania where they succeed by processes of political assassinations. Whenever you hear of a political murder and try to find out where it was and where it occurred, you will find it within the boundaries of the district of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. He represents, in part, a State here which has produced more profiteers during this war, to the acre, than all the other States in this Union combined. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And yet he talks about a trust in cotton and about cotton profiteers. Who has got a trust in cotton? If the prices of cotton were abnormally boosted prior to this war, they were boosted by the gamblers of Philadelphia who gambled in cotton, the men he represents here, and by the gamblers of other great cities of this Union. It comes with bad grace from a man who represents any section of Pennsylvania to complain about profiteering. The gentleman represents a State in which it was developed not long ago by an investigation that they paid $75,000 for a bootblack stand in the basement of their capitol; and that was only in harmony with the other corrupt developments of that investigation. [Laughter.]

Why does not the gentleman propose a tax on wool? I will tell you. In the State of Pennsylvania the farms stand up on end. They can not raise anything there except something that can climb, and sheep and goats can climb; and in Pennsylvania they raise sheep and goats. They produce mohair and they produce wool.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. And therefore the gentleman does not propose to——

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I can not yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I can not yield.

The gentleman does not propose to tax that sort of a material for the making of clothing. Why does he not tax anthracite coal? They produce it in Pennsylvania, and they produce it nowhere else. They consume it out in my State. Why does he not propose a tax on anthracite coal? Because it was produced in the State where they produce also coal profiteers, and he represents them, together with the other profiteers of the State of Pennsylvania. [Laughter.] He talks also about his State paying more than its share of the taxes that are imposed in this bill. I would like to know what taxes they pay in Pennsylvania which they do not pass on to consumers. [Laughter.] I am sick and tired of that kind of argument. I represent one of the three or four States which pay a tremendous amount of taxes, but I have never yet descended to the grade of peanut politics that the gentleman so frequently descends to as to say that my State was paying more than its share of taxes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I ask to proceed for two minutes more.

Mr. HEFLIN. Did he consume seven minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask that the gentleman may have one minute more in which to answer a question.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I can not yield to the gentleman. In the State of Pennsylvania——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to ask the gentleman a pertinent question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I do not yield at all. In the State of Pennsylvania they produce enough steel products, if they were taxed just $2 a ton, not $3, to yield $31,000,000, as much money as the gentleman says they are going to get from the cotton planters of the South. [Applause.] Why does he not propose that kind of a tax? It is because the steel magnates are profiteers. The farmers of the South, on their poor little farms, threatened as they are with the boll weevil and with drought, are not profiteers, and can not be profiteers, and therefore they do not measure up to the exempt standards of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Why does he not propose to tax the corn produced in my State and the wheat produced in my State and throughout this Union? That would be in harmony with the gentleman's proposition to increase the price of bread.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. No; I can not yield. He does not attempt to do that, and he does not dream of doing that. That would not be in the interest of the profiteers of Pennsylvania. [Laughter.] I am wondering if the people who live in his district wear any clothes. [Laughter.] If they do, and I think they do, corrupt and objectionable as his surroundings are, he is endeavoring to increase the cost of everybody's shirt in his district, if they wear shirts, and he is endeavoring to increase the cost of the cotton dresses that they wear in his district, just as he tried awhile ago to increase the cost of their bread. [Laughter and cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 28, noes 100.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think that under the agreement and under the rules of the House my amendment comes in at this time, at this point of the bill, which is ahead of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. Is this a cotton amendment?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This is a cotton amendment. It is offered under the agreement of yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that amendments relating to cotton were to be taken up at the beginning of the session this morning.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, according to the way it was stated by the Chairman, my amendment, taxing the products of child labor, stood first. I think if the Chair will refer to the RECORD he will find that the agreement yesterday applied not only to the amendments of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in regard to cotton, but to the amendment concerning child labor.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; but the agreement requires that the amendments of the gentleman from Pennsylvania would come first in time inasmuch as they relate to cotton.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think if the Chair will consult the RECORD he will find he is in error about it.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will call the attention of the Chair to something in the RECORD that will support him in his statement, the Chair will rule. The Chair thinks that the cotton amendment, according to the agreement, was to be taken up first. If the gentleman will cite the RECORD to the contrary, the Chair will correct the ruling.

Mr. CRISP. I made a point of order against it. I think it would be best to have the point of order decided first.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman to reserve it for three minutes.

Mr. CRISP. I will reserve it for three minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. I understand the point of order was reserved, but when the time was allotted on the other amendment it was distinctly stated that there would be other amendments. I desire to submit some remarks on this general proposition myself, and I wanted to discuss it at this time.

Mr. CRISP. I did not so understand it. I think the revenue bill should be disposed of, and if the point of order is good it is useless to consume the time of the House in discussion of the matter. If the point of order is not good, then we can have just as liberal a discussion as the committee sees fit to have.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman withholds the point of order for three minutes?

Mr. CRISP. Yes; I withhold it for three minutes. Then I desire to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I said about as much as I care to say regarding cotton, in the discussion of the preceding amendment. But as to the flamboyant statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY], my colleague on this committee, in regard to some ancient history of Pennsylvania, which he seems to have read since my point of order was made against his "mixed-flour" amendment this morning, I want to say that while I did not particularly enjoy all the "bouquets" the gentleman threw my way, as to my Commonwealth, my community, or myself, and promptly resent them, I admit that when the gentleman gets angry he runs amuck. He makes observations that are not fortified by facts, and wanders into strange pastures where his eloquence overcomes his good judgment and his love of the truth. [Laughter.]

The gentleman has made a reputation as a "trust buster," as a man who is beating down the "octopus of capital" in order that the "poor unfortunate farmers" of his district may be saved; but the gentleman has not told the House why his "mixed-flour" proposition, coming in now under cover of war and a letter from Mr. Hoover, was opposed by gentlemen on this side.

For one reason it was because the gentleman from Illinois has fathered a bill which he now brings in as an amendment to open up the way for the adulteration of food by unscrupulous millers, a bill that was the creation of the Corn Products Co., a subsidiary to the Standard Oil, for whom the gentleman speaks in this instance. If the gentleman seeks to enter into personalities, I challenge him to explain the peculiar position in which he finds himself as an advocate of a Standard Oil measure to so mix wheat flour that the children of this country will be served adulterated and deleterious food. The gentleman from Illinois has an opportunity, if he desires, to explain that situation. All the virtue is not with the gentleman from Illinois who made that unfortunate and unprovoked attack upon the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as moderately as I can and without offending him in the least, that there is not a scintilla of truth in the statement that he has made. The mixed-flour bill I introduced years ago was introduced at the request of the health-flour makers of the United States. I subsequently amended it. I drew the bill myself. I never heard of the Corn Products Co. in connection with this case until the hearings commenced.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There are 600 pages of the hearings relating to it.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I amended the bill at the request of the white-corn millers of the United States, and I presented the amended bill at their request.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Corn Products Co. was in favor of it.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. It makes no difference who favored it. It was in the interest of cheaper bread and wholesome bread, the kind of bread that we are forced to take now, the kind of bread that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is eating now. The statement that I introduced the bill at the request of any trust or prosecuted it at the request of the Corn Products Co. or the Standard Oil Co. is absolutely and unqualifiedly false.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There are 600 pages of it in the hearings, which any gentleman can read.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment and desire to be heard on it. The gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to insert another paragraph in the bill, levying a tax of $3 a bale on raw cotton. I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not in order on the ground that it violates section 3 of Rule XXI, which reads as follows:

> No amendment shall be in order to any bill affecting revenue which is not germane to the subject matter in the bill; nor shall any amendment to any item of such bill be in order which does not directly relate to the item to which the amendment is proposed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it has always been my wish and desire in this House to acquiesce in the wishes and desires of my colleague, and it is not pleasant to me to insist on making this point of order in lieu of reserving it. But I am so profoundly convinced that the point of order is good, and the fact that the Senate is waiting for this revenue bill and the country is waiting for the money, that it seems to me it would be a useless consumption of time to discuss the merits of the proposition if the point of order is good.

If the point of order is not good, I think the proposition is one of vital importance, and there should be ample debate; but in the discussion of this point of order I shall not touch on what I might call the demerits of the proposition, for, of course, I am against it on principle, but shall confine myself strictly to an argument against the amendment being in order under the rules.

What is the meaning of the rule I have just quoted? It was intended and the purpose of the rule was to change general parliamentary law, to fix a different rule for the consideration of revenue bills from other bills. That rule says that an amendment is not in order unless it is germane not to the subject of the bill but to the subject matter in the bill; and it does not stop there. It goes further and says even then it is not in order unless it relates directly to some item in the bill.

There is no item in the bill providing for a tax on raw cotton. There is nothing in the bill the substance of which is the taxing of raw cotton.

Mr. Chairman, this is not a new proposition. The Chair does not have to go into any new field in deciding this point of order, for the occupants of the chair have decided it in this House. The first ruling made on this clause in Rule XXI was when the Democrats came into power, and was made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER]. Whether that rule is a good rule, or whether it is a bad rule, the Chair is not concerned in passing on the point of order. If it is not a good rule the House, if the majority sees fit, can amend or repeal it; but as long as the rule is in the rule book the Chair and the House are controlled absolutely by it.

When we were considering a revenue bill in the Sixty-second Congress the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]—and I voice the sentiment of all the House when I express the regret that he is not here, and the hope that he will soon be returned to us [applause]—offered innumerable amendments when the House was considering the free list by adding new sections providing that other articles should go on the free list. They were all ruled out of order under the rule that I have just quoted.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am happy to be able to say to the chairman and the committee that this precise amendment has been ruled on. In the last Congress when the last revenue bill was up for consideration my amiable but partisan friend from Pennsylvania, Mr. MOORE, offered an amendment providing a tax should be levied on raw cotton of $2.50 a bale. To that amendment I made a point of order that it was not in order. After argument, participated in by the gentleman from Illinois, the gentleman from Wisconsin, now Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. LENROOT, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Mr. KITCHIN of North Carolina, and others, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] being in the chair sustained my point of order and held that the amendment was not in order. His decision will be found in the RECORD, volume 55, No. 3, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, on page 2664, in the proceedings of May 21, 1917.

From that decision the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] entered an appeal and the appeal was debated, and the vote was taken by the committee itself as to whether the decision of the Chair should be sustained, the Chair having held out of order an amendment exactly like this, offered to a revenue bill, and the committee by a vote of 136 to 117 sustained the Chair and decided that the amendment was not in order.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that decision is binding on the Chair. Away back in 1842 the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, George W. Hopkins, of Virginia, in the course of a ruling made this statement:

> A chairman does not sit here to expound rules according to his own arbitrary views, but a just deference for the opinion of his fellows should constrain him to give to precedent its proper influence, and until the House shall reverse him, to give it all the consideration which is due a case heretofore settled by a solemn decisions of the House.

I count myself happy, Mr. Chairman, in making this point of order to be able to call your attention to an amendment identical with this, offered to a revenue bill, held out of order by the Chair, and then on an appeal to the committee itself held to be out of order.

I might talk longer, but I could add nothing to what I have already said, and I submit that under the rules of the House this amendment is clearly obnoxious to the point of order and should be thrown out. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, of course I am familiar with the ruling referred to by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] with reference to the previous cotton amendment, and am also familiar with Rule XXI, under which Judge ALEXANDER made his famous decision in the tariff case. But I point to the fact that this is a bill "to provide revenue, and for other purposes." There is nothing offensive to the bill or the title in the amendment that has been submitted. It is a plain proposition to raise revenue in accordance with the title and provisions of the bill, and it simply adds another source of revenue to those already enumerated. It is a revenue bill, the title of which is "To provide revenue, and for other purposes."

The Government is in need of the money. If the amendment should pass it would provide an additional revenue for war purposes of $33,000,000. It seems to me that it is not only appropriate, but germane. I say I am aware of the decisions that have been rendered, but I still contend that the amendment is in line with the purposes of the bill; that it is proper to offer such an amendment; that it comes within the purview of the bill; and that the purpose of it is to raise money, and the effect of it would be to raise revenue in accordance with the provisions of the bill and the title.

The CHAIRMAN. The ruling in this case depends upon the construction of subsection 3, of Rule XXI, and its application to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. This subsection is to the following effect:

That no amendment shall be in order to a bill affecting revenue which is not germane to the subject matter in the bill; nor shall any amendment be in order to an item in the bill unless the amendment is directly related to such item.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] in arguing this matter suggests, if the Chair understands his argument correctly, that his amendment is in order because this is a bill to raise revenue, and his amendment proposes to raise revenue. The question of whether the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is in order must be determined by reference to the positive rules of the House relating to amendments to a revenue bill. Manifestly the intent or purpose of a bill is a very different thing from the subject matter in the bill. The intent of this bill is to raise revenue. There is nothing in the subsection of the rule which the Chair has cited which refers in any wise to the intent, or purpose of a bill. The subject matter in a bill is the aggregate of the different items which under the rates proposed and the legislation provided, will raise the revenue required and thereby make effectual the intent of the bill. If the gentleman's amendment is considered to be in order on the ground suggested, namely that this is a revenue bill, then there is no amendment proposing to raise revenue that would not be in order. This bill provides a tax on livery boots. Leather enters into the making of livery boots. Is it conceivable that because an item in the bill taxes boots made of leather, an amendment would be in order establishing a tariff duty on the importation of hides, of which leather is made? Another item provides for a tax on candy. Sugar is a large element in candy. Would it be argued that if this was the only reference to sugar in the bill it would be in order to impose an excise tax on sugar? Another item in the bill taxes adding machines. Iron enters into the manufacture of adding machines. Because the bill taxes a manufactured product that contains iron as a component material, would an amendment be in order taxing pig iron, or iron ore in its natural state? Yet the argument would be the same for all of these amendments, as for the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, since they all propose to raise revenue.

The Chair is not concerned with the merits of any of these propositions, and accepts in this connection the suggestion made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] that the question under consideration is merely one of order. A rule may be wise, or it may be unwise. A rule may limit the powers of the House, or of the committee, but if it plainly states its purpose, if its meaning is clear, then the fact that it limits the power of the House, or of the committee to deal with some particular subject matter is no concern of the Chair, which is interested only in arriving at the true meaning of the rule. Many rules are avowedly for the very purpose of limiting the House in dealing with the subject matters under consideration, in order that the House may legislate sanely and conservatively. Such a rule, and one with which we have frequent experience, is the one prohibiting legislation on an appropriation bill. That rule limits immensely the powers of the Committee of the Whole, and of the House; yet it is accepted as a just and wise rule, although in many instances the House is confronted with situations in which, but for the express limitation of this rule, it would add wholesome legislation to an appropriation bill.

There have been many decisions on this point, so that it is not necessary for the Chair to elaborate this ruling to any great extent. The decision cited by the gentleman from Georgia is precisely in point and covers the case under consideration like a blanket. There is no difference whatever between the facts in the case cited, and the facts of the case under present consideration. The decision of the chairman in that case sustained the point of order, and that decision on appeal was sustained by a vote of the committee. Another ruling in point, was by Mr. Speaker CLARK on a motion to recommit a tariff bill with instructions to report the same with an amendment providing for a tariff commission. The motion was elaborately argued, and the Speaker made a most elaborate ruling, pointing out that the subject matter of the bill was an aggregate of items subjected to tariff taxation, while the amendment proposed to create a commission to collect information in relation to tariffs. The amendment proposed to deal with the tariff in an entirely different manner from that contained in the bill, and it was held to be nongermane and out of order. The ruling of the Speaker was sustained on appeal. In this connection the Chair will also cite the elaborate ruling of Chairman ALEXANDER found in the Manual under the heading of "Important Rulings." The rulings on the point raised by the gentleman from Georgia, as stated a moment ago, are very numerous. This is not a question of first impression. Hence it is hardly necessary for the Chair to elaborate any further the reasons why he holds in conformity with the precedents that this particular amendment is not germane to the subject matter in the bill, nor does it directly relate to any item in the bill.

The Chair, however, does not suppose that the amendment is offered upon the theory that it directly relates to an item in the bill, since no citation has been made of such item. It is not germane to the subject matter in the bill, since there is nothing in the bill resembling the subject matter of this particular amendment. The Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. Before the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is reported, the Chair would like to make a statement in this connection. The gentleman from Iowa asked recognition a few moments ago upon the ground that the amendment which he proposed to offer should come up preferentially to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. The Chair stated that according to his recollection the agreement of yesterday was that the first thing in order this morning would be the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and upon that view he directed that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be first reported. The gentleman from Iowa has cited the RECORD, and the Chair finds upon examination that the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] related to both the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and further that the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is directed to a portion of the bill which precedes that portion of the same at which the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to offer his amendment. If these facts had been heretofore called to the attention of the Chair, he would have extended the first recognition to the gentleman from Iowa. The Clerk will now report the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GREEN of Iowa: Page 129, after line 22, insert a new subdivision, as follows:

"(27) Articles or commodities, the product of any mine, quarry, mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment within the United States in which children under the age of 14 years have been employed or permitted to work, or children between the ages of 14 and 16 have been employed or permitted to work more than eight hours in any day, or more than six days in any week, or after the hour of 6 o'clock post meridian during any portion of the taxable year, 5 per cent."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, on that I make the point of order.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will reserve the point of order for five minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am somewhat surprised to see so many of my friends upon the other side rising to make a point of order upon this amendment, especially as I know——

Mr. MADDEN. Did the gentleman say that he was surprised? I should think that he would say that he was not surprised.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Perhaps I ought not to have been, but I was somewhat surprised that so many gentlemen upon the other side rose to points of order upon this amendment, knowing as I do that they are gentlemen of kindly and generous nature, and not really disposed to work any hardship upon anyone—gentlemen who profess to want to do social justice. Yet that is all this amendment proposes. The committee will observe that this amendment puts a tax of 5 per cent upon the products of child labor below the standard age. I am frank to say to the House that it is not intended particularly as a revenue measure, and probably would not produce any revenue whatever. It would make child labor unprofitable and remove the temptation to use it. The object of this measure is to protect childhood and enable children to grow into men of proper stature, both physically and mentally. Time was when there was nothing so cheap as health and manhood in this world. That time, however, passed years ago, and yet there seem to be some regions where that old idea is still maintained, and if goods can be made more cheaply with child labor, no matter what may be the effect upon the child, the manufacturers will make use of child labor. I suppose that as long as such employment is permitted there will be some so eager for gain as to take advantage of it. I do not believe there is a man in the House who wants to stand here and maintain that children below the age of 14 years ought to be employed in any factory. There is no question whatever but that the use of children of such tender age along with machinery, the constant following of its motion, taking them out of school and limiting their education, makes the child really a part of the machine, so that it stunts his whole development and prevents him from becoming a man of full strength physically and his mind from developing to what it might have if he had the proper opportunities for education and improvement. This idea is one that is scarcely the subject of controversy or discussion among those who have studied social subjects. The injuries which are received by children in the grinding toil of factories are so numerous as to hardly need stating.

Mr. Chairman, why should there be any opposition to this measure for the welfare of children? Why should any Member want to give some manufacturer the privilege to wring from their young bodies profits which in these times of war are already swollen to an unreasonable degree? The greater portion of the States of this Union refuse to permit it, but as long as the laws are not uniform, as long as child labor is permitted in some of the States, a kind of premium is held out to manufacturers in those States to employ children in their factories. By so doing they are able, at the expense of the welfare of the children, to make a greater profit than concerns operating in States where it is forbidden. Thus the greed of unscrupulous parties is fostered, and a hold has been obtained upon some States that it is difficult to break loose.

Mr. Chairman, the employment of children of tender age in factories deprives childhood of those happy hours which ought to be the birthright of every American boy and girl; it takes away their strength and ruins their health through confinement; it suppresses their thoughts and deadens their minds; it brings them into manhood without knowledge and without education; and it makes them unable to properly care for themselves or properly perform the duties of citizenship.

I do not think gentlemen ought to make points of order against so meritorious a proposition as this, a proposition which they would scarcely venture to attack upon the floor, but which they desire to reach by this more subtle method. Gentlemen might just as well understand, however, that this proposition is one which will not down. They may postpone it for a week or a month, or perhaps a year, but it is coming. It is certain to come in the form of Federal regulation, and I shall be surprised if in this very bill before it returns to this House a provision of this kind is not inserted. Gentlemen may fight against it, but the whole march of the ages and the progress of the human mind will sustain it. I repeat that I expect before this bill comes back here that it will be a part of it and gentlemen will have to vote for it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order, and I think the gentleman agrees with me that it is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would like to be heard very briefly. I do not think that the ruling which has just been made with reference to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is controlling upon this amendment which I have offered. The Chair will observe that this is an amendment not to a particular item or a particular paragraph, but is an amendment to section 9, which imposes a tax to be paid by manufacturers upon certain products. Different items are therein specified. It is true that this adds one other item. It extends the list, but it simply adds one of a class without extending the class. It is unquestionably germane to this particular title, and I do not think it comes within the inhibition of Rule XXI, which was cited by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]. The question is, What manufactured goods shall be the subject of tax? The amendment relates back to the very opening of this title specifying the taxation of certain goods and adds one more. At the time of the reciprocity bill, when the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] was in the chair, there was added to the bill in the same way, in relation to items which were included in the free list, a number of different articles. The Chair overruled the point of order against their inclusion. I think that the ruling of the Chair which the Chair heretofore made is not decisive upon the particular amendment which I have offered and that the point of order ought to be overruled.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recalls the ruling made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and cited by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN]. However the decisions which the Chair cited this morning in connection with the ruling then announced, were made subsequent to the ruling of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], and if that ruling and the rulings cited by the Chair are supposed to be in conflict, the latter will be regarded as overruling the lone contrary decision. The Chair has examined the amendment, and comparing it with the bill does not find in the body of the bill any paragraph in which the subject matter is proposed to be dealt with in a manner in anywise resembling the manner in which this amendment proposes to deal with and dispose of the subject matters to which it relates.

This being so, the Chair does not see how under the rulings that have been made this amendment can be regarded as germane to the subject matter in the bill. If it is considered to be germane to any item in the bill the Chair has not been cited to that item.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the Chair will pardon me just a moment, the preceding paragraph referred to a large number of manufactured articles. Now, I do not see how the Chair can determine whether or not those articles have been manufactured by child labor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not undertake so to determine. The bill puts a tax on those articles but the amendment specifically proposes to deal with the same in a very different way from that proposed by the bill. If the Chair is correct in his former ruling, he does not see how this amendment can be in order. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I do it for the purpose of submitting a little piece of poetry which I think ought to go in the RECORD:

THE FIRING SQUAD.

I wonder how long we'll continue to be
A health resort for spies
And other industrious gentlemen
That the papers criticize!
The place for an agent of Kaiser Bill
Is 6 feet under the sod—
I want to hear some corporal yell,
"Fall in, the firing squad!"

Do we get cold feet at the thought of blood,
Have we lost our old-time grit?
If we haven't the guts to kill a man
We'd better lie down and quit.
Do you think you can tame these animals
By the method of "spare the rod"?
Forget it! Come on with the corporal
In command of a firing squad!

If we riddled a few incendiaries
The industry would decline;
If we plugged a couple of profiteers
The rest would stand in line!
And a lot of these devilish anarchists
Would get in and carry the hod
If a few of their leaders went over the range
To the tune of a firing squad.

"Arrested," "Interned," or "Out on bail"—
It's ever the same old song;
And we lay the paper aside to remark,
"How long, O Lord, how long!"
We've seen enough deviltment this past year
To arouse the wrath of God!
Then what is it that we are waiting for?
Come on with the firing squad!

[Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I call up the amendment passed yesterday, page 139, which I offered.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Was it not understood yesterday that as soon as these amendments were out of the way the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] was to have five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is provided for. If his amendment comes in ahead of the gentleman from Indiana, the Chair will recognize him now.

Mr. STEENERSON. No; it is where we left off on page 169.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will see that the rights of the gentleman from Minnesota are fully protected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If this is one of the amendments reserved yesterday, I suppose it would come in ahead of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 139, line 18, after the word "covers," insert the words "except traveling salesmen."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday at the request of a member of the committee this matter went over until to-day. I offered this amendment for the reason that unless this section is amended every traveling salesman, no matter what he is selling, will be subject to this tax of $100.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will yield, I will say to the gentleman that the committee has information that this section has been examined by the proper officials and it will not do what the gentleman says. It will be specific and will not be construed to include traveling salesmen.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman may have the assurance of those in authority that it will not be so construed, but how can they help it? If this language means anything, it means what it says. The gentlemen will have no voice in construing it if it is incorporated as an integral part of this law. If it is not the intention of this committee, or if it is not the intention of this measure that traveling salesmen should be taxed, certainly there should be no objection to this amendment being adopted.

Mr. LOBECK. I would say to the gentleman that in line 18 it says, "Other securities, produce, or merchandise," he is considered to be a broker.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Absolutely.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman, of course, realizes if what he says is true and traveling salesmen are included in this specifically this would leave in all other salesmen than a traveling salesman, and any salesman under its construction would be taxed.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. But the term "traveling salesman" has a definite meaning and has been recognized in law as a man who is a selling agent from a wholesale or a jobbing house to a retail merchant, so that there can be no question about that and there should be no quibble about it. If this language is not sufficient, and if any one else has anything better to offer, let him do so, but this certainly should not pass as it now reads. Under the peculiar language of this section that anyone who sells produce or merchandise is a broker, there can be no question but what he will be subject to this tax. The country is full of them, thousands and thousands of them. I do not think it was intended that they should be taxed, but if this law means what it says everyone will be taxed, every one of these men who are now engaged in selling from the wholesaler to the retailer or jobber to the retailer. It strikes me there should be no objection to our making certain what the committee intends that this class of salesmen should not be taxed.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, the only change made from existing law is including in line 18 the words "produce or merchandise."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is what hurts.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. In other words, the effect of that is to impose a tax of $100 upon a broker in produce or merchandise. Now, a traveling salesman is not a broker in produce or merchandise. He is an agent for a principal, placing goods with retailers on behalf of a principal, who is a wholesaler or jobber.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Take and read the second line of the clause in question, "Every person whose business it is to negotiate purchases or sales," and so forth. Is not the business of a traveling salesman to negotiate the purchase between the wholesaler and the retailer?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. The department has passed upon that language, and they held that a traveling salesman for a stock and bond house was not subject to the tax. That is the holding of the department, and is proper. Now, the effect of the gentleman's amendment will be, if it goes in excepting traveling salesmen after the words "or others," to tax, if that is the only exception to be made, anybody who travels for the purpose of negotiating a sale of stocks, for the purpose of engaging in the sale of bonds, for the purpose of negotiating anything in reference to exchange, bullion, or coin, money or bank notes, or promissory notes. It might tax an agent for a bank who attempted to negotiate a promissory note.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And by its terms it also taxes every salesman who does not travel.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Yes; every salesman who does not travel.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. In order to meet the objections of the gentleman, I will ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment by adding the words—engaged in the sale of produce and merchandise.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. That does not change the sense in the least.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. There can not be any question that a traveling salesman who sells merchandise would be excepted if you put that in, but a traveling salesman who sells other things would have to pay these taxes; and, not only that, if he did not travel and sold from a store or a bond house, or anything of that kind, he would have to pay. The effect of your amendment might be to tax every clerk in any of these places of business who sold anything, if he did not travel.

Mr. MASON. I would like to ask a question. Suppose he sells on a commission, as many of them do, and represents different employers. He may be traveling for a grocery house and would take on what is known as a side line.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. If he does not travel and this amendment goes on, he would have to pay a tax.

Mr. MASON. If he sells on commission, he would have to pay the tax?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. This clause is intended to reach the proprietors, anyway. It would not reach the traveling man.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If this amendment obtains, every man who is a salesman, except a broker, would be relieved from this tax.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. We carefully considered this language in the committee this morning, and also took it up with the department and got the rulings on it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. You say that the distinction lies in the fact that the traveling salesman is employed by some one. Suppose that you added after the word "merchandise" the words "not including employees."

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. It is accomplished anyway by the language here now. They are not going to be taxed and are not taxed. If you put it in, everybody who travels for anything else will be taxed, and people who remain stationary in places of business will be taxed also.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If this law is enforced as it is written—of course there may be a different construction put upon it by the Internal Revenue Department—but if this law is enforced as the language is written into it, there can be no question but that every traveling salesman who is engaged in selling, from one to another, any of these commodities will be taxed.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. This language has been under consideration in the Treasury Department from 1898 to the present time, and there have been three rulings up there under three different laws, and under every one of those rulings traveling salesmen can not be taxed. So what the gentleman is trying to do is already accomplished, and what he will do if this amendment is adopted will be the very thing he does not want to do.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If what the gentleman says is accomplished, it will be accomplished outside of the law and not inside.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my motion to modify, and stand upon the original amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to withdraw his motion to modify, and stand upon the original amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I believe yesterday there were two matters passed over at my request, one having to do with the return to the estate tax item—Title IV, page 68. I desired to offer an amendment exempting the estate of soldiers killed in the service or who died as the result of wounds received in the service. This matter was considered this morning in the committee, and the committee saw fit not to adopt the suggestion, and therefore I do not care to press the point under the request I made yesterday.

I also had another request, on page 144, adding a new paragraph there, which would be for the purpose of taxing advertising in public places, either by billboards, electric signs, or otherwise. Some objection has been raised to that amendment, which was read yesterday, in that it was in competition with newspaper advertising, which is not taxed. Personally I feel that newspaper advertising is taxed in the increase of postage rates under the zone system, but that is neither here nor there. There is no direct rivalry, it seems to me, between the two kinds of advertising; that is, newspaper advertising and the so-called billboard advertising. I have spoken in reference to billboard advertising under general debate. I do not care at this time to take up the time of the committee to press the matter, in view of the attitude of the Ways and Means Committee on the subject, and therefore I will waive my rights under the reservations of yesterday.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I raise a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The point of order is that it is proposed new legislation and is not germane to any item.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has waived his rights.

Mr. TREADWAY. I did not see any necessity of raising the point of order when I have waived my rights under the reservation.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, like the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], I secured unanimous consent to introduce to-day a new paragraph to section 900, namely, an amendment placing a tax on extraordinary steel products. But in view of the broad ruling on the part of the Chairman, I realize that my amendment would not be in order, or would be ruled out of order, and therefore I do not desire to take up the time of the House and will not avail myself of my right.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wanted to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he had discovered, since he proposed his amendment yesterday, that there are some very large steel furnaces and foundries and factories in the State of Illinois?

Mr. SABATH. That would not affect me at all, because I have no more love for a profiteer if he is in Illinois than for one that might be in Pennsylvania or any other State.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand.

Mr. SABATH. But I do not introduce the amendment, believing it to be out of order, and I do not wish to take up the time of the House.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman will admit that there are some very large industries in the State of Illinois that pay taxes very heavily?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; they pay them, and they pay them as readily as they do in Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was not raising that issue. I wanted to compliment the gentleman on the industries of his own State.

Mr. SABATH. I thank the gentleman. We are always ready to pay our share and a little more, and we do not make a point on that. But that does not stop me in any way from offering my amendment. I do not press it for the reason I stated—that it would not be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to offer my amendment under the agreement of yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment under the agreement made yesterday. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DYER: Page 133, line 2, after the word "slippers," insert the following: "not including boots, leggings, and shoes of officers in the military or naval forces of the United States."

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the committee to this: In this same section, paragraph 11, the committee has recognized this principle by providing, so far as shoes and overcoats are concerned, page 132, line 10, the following:

Men's and boys' suits or overcoats, not including uniforms of officers in the military or naval forces of the United States.

Now, on page 133, paragraph 17, there is no provision exempting from taxation the boots and shoes of officers in the military or naval forces of the United States.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think there is a distinction, in that the officers can get the articles to which the gentleman's attention is directed now from the quartermaster.

Mr. DYER. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion, but I am told that there is not yet opportunity for officers so to obtain these shoes, and if they can obtain them otherwise and desire to do so they should be permitted to do so, the same as clothing and overcoats. Now, they obtain overcoats——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not understand that the Quartermaster Department carries the kind of clothing that officers usually wear. That was the reason why the committee made the other exception.

Mr. DYER. I think the committee probably did not have its attention called to that provision. Otherwise I think the committee would have made the same suggestion.

I want to call the attention of the committee to the cost of these articles now upon the market. The boots of officers of the Army now cost an average of $30 a pair. Leggings cost $15 a pair, and shoes average $12 a pair. Each of these articles would be taxed if the provision I have offered is not included. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] if the committee will not accept that provision?

There seems to be no objection to it. It is the same provision, I will say to the gentleman, applying to boots and shoes as that which the committee has already put in the bill with reference to suits or overcoats. I will say to the gentleman that the provision is, in effect, that this tax shall not include boots and shoes sold to officers in the naval or military forces of the United States. It is a principle that is already recognized in the bill on the preceding page as to uniforms and suits of clothing. I think the omission of it here was a mistake on the part of the committee. Probably the committee did not have its attention called to the matter, or probably the committee might have thought those articles did not cost more than $10. But I have ascertained the prices of those articles, and, as I stated before, boots such as are worn by officers of the Army now cost on an average $30 a pair and leggings an average of $15 and shoes an average of $12. I think the committee ought not to contest that amendment.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Does the gentleman insist that officers' shoes are different from some other varieties of shoes that civilians are accustomed to purchase?

Mr. DYER. They have to be of a high order and high quality because of the use they make of them.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The committee considered the shoe phase of this matter somewhat extensively, and the committee were utterly unable to lay down a rule which would distinguish shoes which officers of the Army would purchase and shoes which Members of Congress and citizens generally purchase.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman does not get my point. On page 132, the preceding page, in paragraph 11, the provision reads as follows:

Men's and boys' suits and overcoats, not including uniforms of officers in the military or naval forces of the United States.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. They can usually be distinguishable from civilian clothing, and it was not a matter of difficulty to define them.

Mr. DYER. I understand; but officers under the present law and regulations, men who are in the military or naval service, are compelled to appear at all times in their uniforms, and if they go into a store to purchase a pair of shoes or a pair of boots they will be easily distinguishable as men who are entitled to that privilege.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The committee was of the opinion that that would open the door to many irregularities in making these purchases. If a civilian wanted a pair of shoes of high value he could get some friend of his who had on the uniform to go in and purchase them for him.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Does not the gentleman think you could improve the amendment by limiting it to boots and leggings, cutting out the term "shoes"?

Mr. DYER. I would be willing to modify it, but I would not want to insist upon any amendment which the committee does not approve, and where the committee has carefully considered the matter, although I think this is a very deserving one. But I have so great a respect for this Committee on Ways and Means and the work they have done upon this bill, that I would not insist upon an amendment which they did not approve after careful consideration. I think this is a very just one. I thought it had not been called to the attention of the committee.

I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee if he would be willing to accept the amendment suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] to limit the amendment to Army boots and leggings, which none would want but an Army officer? They now cost $30 a pair for the boots and $15 a pair for the leggings. It is a very expensive matter for the officers.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that the committee has gone some distance in its effort to give some special relief to the soldiers in the Army and sailors in the Navy with respect to their uniforms and in respect to the salaries they get from the Government, but the committee did not think it was wise to go into every detail.

Mr. DYER. Of course, the committee were not called upon to investigate the subject, but does the gentleman know that the average cost of the equipment of a second lieutenant or other officer is approximately $500? Everything that he buys has advanced from 100 to 150 per cent in the last 10 years, and a lot of deserving young men who are competent to be officers and who could be promoted from the ranks and otherwise become officers decline to be promoted for that reason. I know of cases where men have declined commissions because they could not afford to buy the equipment, which has advanced in price.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. For the very reason the gentleman states this bill exempts from taxation the officer's salary and it exempts his uniform. Those are the two principal items, and the committee thought they had done very well.

Mr. DYER. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that it is practically impossible now for first and second lieutenants and captains to get along on the salaries that they receive.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment.

The question being taken; on a division (demanded by Mr. DYER) there were—ayes 13, noes 37.

Accordingly the amendment of Mr. DYER was rejected.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, yesterday I obtained unanimous consent to offer an amendment with respect to paragraph 11, on page 128. I now withdraw that request and ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this paragraph of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD with reference to the paragarph referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands, this completes all of the unanimous-consent agreements except the one relating to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], who is recognized for a motion to strike out the last word of the paragraph, which the Clerk had read when the committee rose on yesterday.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, the paragraph to which I refer, and which I propose later to move to strike out, is as follows:

14. Parcel-post packages: Upon every parcel or package transported from one point in the United States to another by parcel post on which the postage amounts to 25 cents or more, a tax of 1 cent for each 25 cents or fractional part thereof charged for such transportation, to be paid by the consignor.

The same provision is found on page 80 with regard to express packages, with this difference, that express packages pay a tax of 1 cent for every 20 cents or fraction thereof, so that the sender of a package by express, whether he pays 20 cents or less, pays the tax, whereas by parcel post the 1 cent applies only where the postage is 25 cents or more. I think this matter was not appreciated by the Committee on Ways and Means when they acted on it. The fact is that at the last count in 1917 there were 1,041,000,000 parcels transported by parcel post. The average postage charge was 6 cents, and the average weight was 1 pound and 14 ounces, or less than 2 pounds; so that under the best calculation that one can make this tax reaches only about 10 per cent of the parcels. The Treasury Department have no figures as to how much revenue this will yield, but upon inquiry I learn that it is perhaps between $500,000 to $1,000,000. Now, if the same tax had been imposed that is imposed upon express packages, the Government would have collected $10,041,000; so that by this proposition you lose practically $10,000,000 of revenue.

It is true that the parcel post was established largely in the interest of the farmer, and when the limit was 11 pounds the claim was made that in the interest of the farmer it should be increased to 20 pounds; and when it was 20 pounds, for the same reason it was increased to 50 pounds, and later to 70 pounds. Now, I find that all the parcels that are shipped from the country and paid for by the farmer, or at least a majority of them, pay 25 cents or more, so that he is taxed, but the parcels that come from the city to the farmer are nearly all small parcels comparatively, and very few of them pay any tax, because, as I have stated, out of the 1,000,000,000 packages the average weight is less than 2 pounds.

You can send 2 pounds to the antipodes, to the Philippines, for 24 cents, and therefore a parcel of that weight escapes the tax. The only people who pay this tax are the farmers who send 10, 20, or 21 pounds. I was consulting with the department this morning as to the motor-truck business, and they tell me that the packages are usually three or four times as large as the ordinary parcel-post packages and that a very large part of them pay 25 cents postage for their transportation. That amount is paid by the sender in addition to the tax. Now, I would like to have somebody tell me why the farmer should be taxed when he sends his eggs or butter by parcel post and why the man who sends the smaller package, but probably of greater value, should escape. The proposition is unfair. If you applied the same reasoning as is applied to the express companies, those companies are just as much under Government control as the railroads are, and if it is right to tax the man who sends by express it is equally right to tax the man who sends a small package by parcel post. This is not a tax on the express company or on the post office. It is a tax on the sender of the package, and if you tax the sender of an express package 1 cent if he sends 5 or 6 or 7 pounds, is there any reason why it is more meritorious to send by one means of conveyance than another? This bill is framed upon the theory that the tax should be fair and just, without any discrimination. Here is a discrimination against the farmer, who sends large packages upon which the postage is 25 cents or more, and in favor of the merchants in the cities, who send small packages, as I have stated. If you want revenue without injuring anybody, without imposing undue burdens, it seems to me you ought to place the same tax upon packages sent by parcel post as is already placed upon packages sent by express. That will be perfectly fair. We have raised the postage upon the letter of the common people from 2 cents to 3 cents for 1 ounce, and if a man has a parcel that weighs enough to go by parcel post he can well afford to pay a small tax on that. Upon inquiry I learn that the value of the small parcels is usually greater than that of the large ones. The man who sends farm produce in a large package weighing 20, 21, 25, or 50 pounds does not get a very high price for it; but the jeweler who sends silverware or the hardware man who sends cutlery or safety razors costing $5 or $6 or $7 escapes any tax on the lighter package which he sends.

Now, the effect of having a similar rule for transportation by express for the parcel post would be that you would collect extra revenue without burdening anybody or making an unfair discrimination. If you are unwilling to do that, it is my purpose to move to strike out the whole parcel-post section, because I do not think you should impose a burden on 25-cent postage packages and all the rest go free. There should be no discrimination of that kind. I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEENERSON. Now I move to amend by striking out the words "on which the postage amounts to 25 cents or more." That will make the tax applicable to all parcels, regardless of the amount of postage.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk informs the Chair that we have not reached that part of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes, Mr. Chairman; we have read to page 170, Title XII.

The CHAIRMAN. The section to which the gentleman refers has been read and the gentleman's motion is in order.

Mr. STEENERSON. I move to strike out, on page 170, the words "on which the postage amounts to 25 cents or more."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 170, line 1, after the word "post," strike out the words "on which the postage amounts to 25 cents or more."

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Has not the succeeding paragraph been read?

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, as I remember the parliamentary situation, the gentleman from Minnesota last evening, as soon as the paragraph was read, moved to strike out the last word. It is true that the Clerk was reading rapidly and read some further lines.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman reserved the right to strike out the last word; now he is offering a new amendment.

Mr. STEENERSON. The Clerk read line 4, and two lines more when I was on my feet.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman reserved the right to strike out the last word and not to offer an amendment to the paragraph which has been read. As I understand it, he simply desired to make some remarks on the motion to strike out the last word, and now he offers an amendment.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The record shows that the Clerk read line 8 of the bill, and a while ago I made a point of order against the amendment on the ground that this paragraph had been passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota had some agreement in respect to it.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes, Mr. Chairman; the gentleman from North Carolina, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, said that we might take it up to-day.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But the gentleman's request was on a motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. STEENERSON. I did say that I would move to strike out the last word, and I did it right there.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And the gentleman has addressed himself to that motion, but now he offers another amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from North Carolina is now in the Hall. As I recollect, the gentleman from North Carolina gave assurance to the gentleman from Minnesota last night that he would not lose any rights on a motion to strike out the last word by the committee rising.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is true; his motion was in order.

Mr. DYER. But he now offers another amendment.

Mr. STEENERSON. I move to strike out these words.

Mr. KITCHIN. The understanding was that the gentleman had an amendment—I do not remember whether he offered it then or not—but that he should not be prejudiced by any action of the House and that his amendment should be in order to-day.

Mr. LONGWORTH. These are the facts. Not only had lines 5 to 7, inclusive, been read, but the Clerk had also read down to the first line of the advisory tax board.

Mr. STEENERSON. I said I would like to discuss this matter in relation to the parcel post, and I was on the floor all the time.

Mr. MADDEN. Before we reached that stage of the bill the gentleman from Minnesota rose in his place and said that he wanted to offer an amendment to this section of the bill when it was reached.

Mr. KITCHIN. That was my understanding. I came down the aisle, and I told the gentleman to withhold that, and that we would give him an opportunity to offer his amendment to-day.

Mr. STEENERSON. I have offered the amendment, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not desire to do anything except to carry out the agreement that the chairman of the committee may have had with the gentleman from Minnesota. The RECORD does not state that there was any understanding of that kind.

The CHAIRMAN. While the RECORD does not cover all that may have been said between the gentleman from Minnesota and the gentleman from North Carolina, the Chair understands the gentleman from North Carolina to say that he did have the understanding with the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understand the gentleman wishes to tax all parcel-post packages, regardless of the postage that they will bear.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand that the gentleman's amendment was to strike out that section, and that was the amendment that I assured him he could offer—the amendment which he then had in his hand.

Mr. STEENERSON. That is the same amendment that I am now talking about.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment has been submitted, voted on, and rejected.

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, no; that has not been voted on.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is the only amendment that we had an agreement upon.

Mr. STEENERSON. Here is the amendment that I had in my hand at the time yesterday. It is the same one that I am now offering, to strike out those words, so as to make it a tax of 1 cent on each 25 cents.

The CHAIRMAN. It is easy enough to settle the matter if we can only get at the facts. The Chair understands that the gentleman made a motion to strike out the section.

Mr. STEENERSON. That was after I got through with striking out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Then that motion has been submitted.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that the motion to which the gentleman from North Carolina was referring?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; the amendment which I had in my hands yesterday, on which I asked recognition, is the amendment now being offered.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understood the gentleman to say it was the motion to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. The simplest way out of this is for the gentleman to offer his amendment.

Mr. STEENERSON. Did the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] get through?

Mr. STAFFORD. I just inquired what is the purpose of it.

Mr. STEENERSON. One cent for each 25 cents, to be paid by the sender. If he pays 50 cents, his tax is 2 cents. The law in regard to parcels sent by express is 1 cent for 20 cents and 2 cents for 40 cents and so on, or a fraction thereof, so that it puts it pretty nearly on a parity.

Mr. STAFFORD. If that is the purpose of the gentleman, what will be gained by striking out the words he now proposes to strike out?

Mr. STEENERSON. Because now as the law is and as the bill is, if you pay less than 25 cents postage, you pay no tax, but on parcels that pay 25 cents or 26 cents or 27 cents or over, there is a tax, while every parcel that pays 24 cents or 23 cents or less goes free, if sent by parcel post.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the amendment of the gentleman accomplish the purpose that he seeks? Packages containing less postage than 25 cents will not be taxed as the paragraph now reads.

Mr. STEENERSON. It is a tax for each 25 cents or fractional part thereof. The package would have to bear at least 25 cents postage before it would pay any additional tax at all. As the paragraph now stands it goes free, if the postage is less than 25 cents. It is a stamp tax. The other is simply a tax collected by the company, a facility tax, the same as the tax on freight. But that makes no difference, both are paid by the shipper, and as both means of transportation are equally lawful there should be no discrimination. By the present proposition you not only discriminate between two similar services, but you tax the farm-produce business—"the farm-to-the-table movement"—and you let the profitable business that moves from city to country go almost entirely free.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, yesterday paragraph (b) at the top of page 61 was passed over by unanimous consent in order that the matter might be considered by the committee. The committee considered the suggestion this morning, and now it is perfectly agreeable to the committee that the reservation be withdrawn and that the paragraph be read and completed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from North Carolina advise the committee how many paragraphs have been passed over that have not been acted upon?

Mr. KITCHIN. There is the soldier-exemption proposition, paragraph 8, page 12; section 202, the inventory paragraph, which I think we might as well pass over now; section 214, paragraph 10, the depletion provision, relating to oil and gas wells, and so forth; and section 234, paragraph 9, which involves the same depletion allowances. I think they are the only provisions remaining that have been passed over for action later. I want to say to the committee——

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. What was done with the paragraph relating to the learned professions?

Mr. KITCHIN. We passed that this morning. We struck it out and inserted exactly the language of the act during the Civil War—

> Persons engaged in any trade, business, or profession, whose gross receipts therefrom for the preceding year ending June 30 exceeds $2,500 shall pay $10. If such person is a wholesaler he shall pay $5 additional.

Mr. ROBBINS. You eliminated the individual, such as a minister.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; if a minister makes over $2,500, he must pay $10.

Mr. ROBBINS. That applies to all school-teachers and all professional men.

Mr. KITCHIN. Anyone engaged in a trade, business, or profession.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire when the gentleman intends to return to the paragraphs passed over?

Mr. KITCHIN. I just started to say that if we could finish reading the bill this afternoon—and we have only about 20 pages left—I should like to have the committee consider the oil and gas depletion provision to-morrow morning. We might dispose of the others this afternoon, and that would leave only one matter open to-morrow.

Mr. GOOD. When will the gentleman return to page 12?

Mr. KITCHIN. When we finish the bill.

Mr. GOOD. This afternoon or to-morrow morning?

Mr. KITCHIN. If we do not have time to return to it this afternoon, we will hold it open for to-morrow.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question about oil and gas? That is a vital matter to my constituents. Has that amendment yet been submitted.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; we have not finished it. We have finished the amendment to take care of potash and other mineral deposits, and are now considering the proposition of depletion in respect to the flow of oil and gas.

Mr. ROBBINS. I wanted to inquire whether you had submitted the form which you proposed as a change to the statute.

Mr. KITCHIN. Not now. We are going to consider the question whether we will offer an amendment or not.

Mr. PLATT. Has section 326 been reserved for amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; that has already been agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. There is one amendment there with regard to the definition of capital, which changes the present law and it is contrary to what is stated in the report of the committee.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know; we have agreed to that section and there was no request made to pass it.

Mr. PLATT. I would like to ask unanimous consent to return, to offer one amendment there.

Mr. KITCHIN. We would object to that. I think there is not anything in the bill that took more of our time and thought than the invested-capital proposition. I do not think there is any question that could be raised that we did not discuss in the committee. I would rather not. That would reopen the whole question of the excess-profits tax.

Mr. PLATT. The report says you have not changed the present law. You have. You have taken out the valuation, January 1, 1914, which is in the present law.

Mr. KITCHIN. We struck out——

Mr. PLATT. Yes; and I would like to return to that, so as to offer an amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. We should object, I regret to say to the gentleman from New York, because that opens up the whole question of excess-profits tax.

Mr. PLATT. It simply restores what is in the present law.

Mr. KITCHIN. The report might have said that; if so, the report was misleading in that respect.

Mr. PLATT. I had understood this was one of the sections reserved.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; and I would ask the Clerk to read.

Mr. PLATT. It will not take five minutes to offer the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1200. That there is hereby created a board to be known as the "Advisory Tax Board," hereinafter call the board, and to be composed of five members to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The board shall remain in existence during the continuance of the present war with the Imperial German Government and for a period of 12 months after the termination of such war as declared by proclamation of the President.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee the purpose of placing the salaries of the members of this advisory board at $9,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. Why we did that?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have read the report and the reason why it was placed at that figure, and yet we have boards which I assume are performing as valuable work as this advisory tax board will perform who are receiving $7,500.

Mr. KITCHIN. Members of some boards receive $7,500, some $12,000, and others different salaries. Take, for instance, the Federal Trade Commission. Members of that commission get $10,000. I do not think the Federal Trade Commission, as far as responsibility and the importance of the questions to come before it——

Mr. STAFFORD. And the work they are performing.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; and the work they are performing anything compare with the work these gentlemen have to perform; and I think this board will be as important and have more duties and larger responsibilities than any other similar commission or board.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it the purpose that this board should supplement the activities of the commissioner and the assistant commissioners, or is it to be independent of their jurisdiction?

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course, it is under the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. All questions arising with respect to the interpretation or administration of the law may be submitted to this board by the commissioner and shall be submitted upon the request of any taxpayer, so practically it will review all cases where a controversy arises.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then they are only advisory, subject to review by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue——

Mr. STAFFORD. And by the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course, they could go to the courts if they wanted to go further, but I take it the findings of this board will be the findings of the commissioner, because he can not possibly have time to look into these cases personally.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say there is not a man on the committee who thought the salary was too high, but a great many thought it ought to be larger.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice the committee has adopted the policy in this bill of increasing the salaries of collectors and of assistant commissioners and the like——

Mr. KITCHIN. Really, the facts justified the increase of the salary, and this committee has not hesitated to recommend the increases as the gentleman would if he had been on the committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will realize that this will be taken as an earnest by public officials generally to ask for increases.

Mr. KITCHIN. Not in cases of this kind.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not as far as the advisory tax board is concerned.

Mr. KITCHIN. There is no other officer of the Government whose duties and responsibilities have increased anything to be compared with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and his officers.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not even the Assistant Secretaries of War, whose salaries remain the same?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think they have had their duties or responsibilities increased anything like these officers.

Mr. STAFFORD. Who are charged with the full responsibility of winning the war?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 170, line 13, strike out all after the word "Senate," strike out all the rest of line 13 and lines 14, 15, 16, and 17, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "The members of the board first appointed shall be appointed for terms of one, two, three, four, and five years, respectively, and thereafter the term of each member shall be five years."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order.

Mr. BORLAND. What is the point of order?

Mr. MADDEN. My point of order is that the provision of the bill following the word "Senate," which the gentleman seems to wish to strike out, makes the board temporary, and the gentleman is seeking to make a permanent board out of what is proposed to be a temporary one.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's point of order is not well taken. The board, according to the present scheme of the law there, is appointed at the pleasure of the President. The following paragraph says that any member may be subject to removal by the President. The gentleman's point of order is not well taken. My opinion is that the whole section creating an advisory tax board may be subject to a point of order. But if so a germane amendment to a section which otherwise would be subject to a point of order would thus not be subject to a point of order. I submit to the Chair that defining the terms of these officers who are now appointed by will is a germane amendment, and is perfectly germane to the purposes of the section, and not subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The effect of the amendment seems to be to enlarge the term of office of the appointees under this section, but it does not occur to the Chair there is any reason why it is not in order for this to be done by an amendment which is germane. This commission and their terms are established by the bill. The amendment proposes to change the terms.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I submit the point of order comes too late, because I was recognized to perfect the paragraph by offering an amendment, which I did offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not direct a point of order against the entire paragraph after an amendment has been offered.

Mr. WALSH. Debate had not begun. The fact that an amendment was offered does not debar making a point of order against the entire paragraph. The rules say "after debate has begun."

The CHAIRMAN. That means that after the paragraph has been read and opportunity given to make or reserve a point of order. This opportunity must be afforded, and if not availed of, then it is too late thereafter to raise the question of order. In this case the opportunity was given because the point of order to the paragraph could have been made before the gentleman from Missouri offered his amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Debate could not begin when the point of order was made against the amendment that was offered.

The CHAIRMAN. To the paragraph?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph was read. It was then before the House and open first for a point of order, and then for amendment. Anyone making, or reserving a point of order would have been entitled to prior recognition to the gentleman from Missouri. No one made a point of order to the paragraph. Hence the gentleman from Missouri asking recognition to offer an amendment, was in order. He was recognized, and submitted an amendment to the paragraph to which an amendment was directed.

Mr. MADDEN. I maintain the point of order will lie until debate has begun on the paragraph. No debate having been had on the paragraph, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] having offered an amendment to which a point of order was made, notwithstanding that point of order was overruled, the paragraph is still pending without debate, and the question is whether it is subject to a point of order or not on its merits. That is the only question that is pending now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand that this has been the practice of the House at all.

Mr. MADDEN. The Chair is supreme here, unless overruled.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no pride of opinion about this matter whatever. If the practice of the House has been to the contrary of his ruling the Chair will be glad to be advised of it.

Mr. MADDEN. I think there is no doubt about what the practice of the House has been.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to be cited to any rule, or precedent contrary to his ruling. With the consent of the committee the Chair will state precisely what has taken place. The paragraph was read, and was then open to a point of order, or reservation of a point of order. No one rose to make, or reserve a point of order. Thereupon an amendment was offered to the paragraph. A point of order was made to this amendment, and overruled. A point of order was then sought to be made to the paragraph proposed to be amended, and the Chair ruled that this motion was too late. That is the understanding of the Chair of what has taken place in this connection.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the Chair allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the Chair maintain, because an amendment was offered to which a point of order was made, it leaves the paragraph in any other situation than it would have been if no amendment had been offered?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair maintains that after a paragraph has been read in due course, and opportunity thereby given, to make, or reserve a point of order, and neither is made, it is too late to make a point of order to the paragraph after an amendment has been submitted. There are many Members of the House now present, who are experienced parliamentarians and the Chair will be glad to hear from them in this connection, if they are of opinion that the ruling just made, is erroneous, and that under the state of facts cited, a point of order could be made to the paragraph proposed to be amended.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think if my friend from Illinois will think of it for a moment, there is nothing wrong with the Chair's reasoning on this proposition. A point of order was made to an amendment to the paragraph. Business had intervened. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] shakes his head. He wishes to limit it to a technical proposition as to debate. But the gentleman must realize that where business had not intervened, the point of order was made before any amendment had been made to it.

Mr. MADDEN. The rule does not make any such construction as that at all. It simply says that the point of order must be made before debate is begun. Now, no debate has been had. That is what the rule says—not before an amendment has been offered but before debate has begun.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Why, Mr. Chairman, if that should be the rule of the House or the practice of the House, then it would result in always doing just exactly what has occurred at this time.

The gentleman from Illinois is not opposed to the original proposition, I assume; at least he did not interpose the point of order to it. He waits. Now a proposition is passed to which he is opposed and to which I am opposed and to which a majority of this House, I apprehend, will be opposed. But the gentleman can not then, in order to defeat that, interpose a point of order against the proposition that had already been read and passed. The reasoning of it is perfectly clear. The orderly procedure of the House, in my humble judgment, would depend upon sustaining the Chair in the ruling that he has just made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will read one precedent, out of a number that might be cited.

On December 16, 1898, the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union considering the bill (H. R. 11191) to extend the laws relating to customs and internal revenue over the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. William H. Moody, of Massachusetts, offered an amendment providing for the extension also of the laws of the United States relating to the appointment of officers in the Customs and Internal-Revenue Services.

Mr. Leonidas F. Livingston, of Georgia, asked if it was proposed to extend the civil-service laws to Hawaii.

Mr. Moody replied to this question, whereupon Mr. JOSEPH G. CANNON, of Illinois, suggested a point of order.

Mr. Moody raised the question of order that the point of order came too late. The point of order against the point of order, was sustained, on the ground that it came too late.

On the next page of Hinds' Precedents is a ruling to the effect that when a paragraph is read, then is the time to offer a point of order. That is what the Chair has always understood to be the practice. The Chairman in the above connection ruled as follows:

Without deciding the question as to whether, under the special rule under which we are proceeding, objection would have been in order if it had been made in time, the Chair is of the opinion that the point of order not having been made, it is now too late to make it, just the same as in case of the rule forbidding legislation on an appropriation bill. If the point is not made when such an amendment is offered, or until after debate, it comes too late. The Chair therefore holds that the point of order is not well taken.

In this case no point of order was made to the paragraph, or sought to be made, before the amendment was offered. After the amendment was offered, and held to be in order, it was too late to make a point of order to the paragraph. This ruling in the judgment of the Chair conforms to the precedents, and practice of the House.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph creates an advisory tax board to continue during the period of the war with the Imperial German Government and for a period of 12 months after the termination of such war. The purpose of my amendment is to provide for a permanent tax board without any other change in its character. I think that the committee has been wise in providing this tax board, in view of the complications of this law and the fact that it must be drawn in general terms, covering a multitude of businesses of every variety and kind. All sorts of complications, all sorts of peculiar characters of business, must be brought under this in order that everybody shall be treated equally, and nobody shall be allowed to escape from this common burden. It is absolutely essential that some tribunal be created where these conflicting claims and peculiar conditions can be presented.

Now it is true that in many cases in the bill the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is given power to adjust certain equities or to adapt the law to certain peculiar conditions by regulation or by special provision. But that does not contemplate essentially any hearing to the taxpayer or business man. The difference between that and this advisory tax board is that this contemplates very clearly that the taxpayer or business man is going to have some kind of a hearing, some kind of an opportunity to present before a board of experts the peculiar conditions of his business. I agree with that very heartily.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Did the gentleman say "a board of experts"?

Mr. BORLAND. I think so. I hope so.

Mr. MADDEN. If they are appointed in this case as they have been appointed in other cases, they will not know anything about the matters for which they are appointed.

Mr. BORLAND. Oh. I know that several members of the gentleman's party are now members of some of these boards. I think most of them are good men. I think the committee is wise in putting this provision in, but I do not think any argument could be advanced for putting it in which could not be advanced for a permanent board of that kind. It is just as cogent.

It is going to be a long time, as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] suggested the other day, before we get rid of this new flock of Federal taxes. We have no idea how many years in the future it is going to be before we get rid of these taxes. We do not know how many years the income tax is going to remain or the war tax or the excess-profits tax.

They may remain with us for many years, because the bonded indebtedness and the interest indebtedness may run along for many years after this war, and the taxes must be sufficient to meet that. So that we are not going to get rid of this enlarged tax scheme 12 months after the declaration of peace with the Imperial German Government. If that is true, and if it is necessary to have a tax board during the time of war it is also necessary to continue that tax board afterwards for the performance of the same functions, and if it should appear that 12 months after the declaration of peace the tax board is no longer needed the Congress will have power to abolish it.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Likewise the Congress will have the power to continue this board after the war.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; but I want to call the gentleman's attention to this fact, that we are asking the gentlemen who are worth the $9,000 or more to take a position on these boards—when and how? For a fixed term? No. We are asking them to do it practically at the pleasure of the administration. We are asking men who ought to be big enough to exercise these functions and who ought to be business experts, to take a shifting, temporary position. That is the difficulty. It is not the question that Congress can continue this board, because I am as certain as that I stand here that Congress will continue it. That is not the question. The question is the type of men who are going to take the positions at the most critical time in the board's history.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Does not the gentleman think these prospective gentlemen who will constitute this board will be asking for these positions rather than that the administration is going out after them to find them?

Mr. BORLAND. Well, I have never seen any position on earth that men do not ask for, but I think that the men who are going to take these positions may, perchance, be selected without their solicitation. I think that has been done in repeated cases recently. I recall a case here a few hours ago when one of our former colleagues was probably very much surprised by being called to assume a very high post. It is not strange that the office will seek the man in some cases. At any rate, even if a man is disposed to ask for the office, or if he is asked to take the office, one of the things that will occur to him is, How long will I have to give up my business in order to do this? Is this a fixed term? Am I to serve five years, and know that I am to serve five years, or am I to serve for five months, or for a year?

Now, a man of business ability and high connections can not make such a change on a moment's notice. So, in my judgment, it will strengthen this law to have it made a permanent board.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Vacancies in the membership of the board shall be filled in the same manner as an original appointment. Any member shall be subject to removal by the President. The President shall designate the chairman of the board. Each member shall receive an annual salary of $9,000, payable monthly, together with actual necessary expenses when absent from the District of Columbia on official business.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ESCH: Page 170, line 24, after the word "business," insert:

"Provided, That the clerks and other employees of such board as may be required shall be appointed from lists of eligibles to be supplied by the Civil Service Commission and in accordance with the civil-service law."

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, this is like the provision contained in several other pieces of war legislation. It is like the provision contained in the Federal railroad-control act, the food-control act, and others.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. GARNER) there were—ayes 33, noes 32.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BEAKES] desires to be counted in the negative. He was not counted.

Mr. GOOD. I make the point of order that the result has been announced.

Mr. KITCHIN. Has the Chair announced the vote?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has announced the vote.

Mr. KITCHIN. I demand tellers.

Mr. STAFFORD. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. KITCHIN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee proceeded to divide.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the vote being taken upon?

The CHAIRMAN. This is a division on the motion that the committee do now rise.

Mr. KITCHIN. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina has demanded tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. He demanded tellers after a division had been demanded, and the Chair was counting.

Mr. KITCHIN. I demanded tellers on the announcement of the Chair that the noes seemed to have it. Now, I demand tellers.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, did not the gentleman from North Carolina move that the committee do now rise?

The CHAIRMAN. He did.

Mr. KITCHIN. I made that motion for the purpose of getting tellers.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is asking for tellers, and the Chair ought to see if that demand is sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks that the vote on his motion that the committee rise be taken by tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. ESCH and Mr. GARNER.

The committee again divided.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, on what is the vote by tellers being taken?

The CHAIRMAN. This is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina that the committee do now rise.

The tellers reported—ayes 5, noes 57.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee declines to rise.

Mr. KITCHIN. A point of no quorum was made. There are about 30 or 40 gentlemen on the other side who did not vote, who ought to be counted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] has made the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-three Members, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Almon	Dillon	Helvering	McFadden
Aswell	Drukker	Hensley	McKinley

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman of the committee, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having under consideration the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, had found itself without a quorum; that he had caused the roll to be called, whereupon 296 Members answered to their names, and he presented a list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

Page 170, line 24, after the word "business," insert:

"Provided, That the clerks and other employees of said board as may be required shall be appointed from lists of eligibles to be supplied by the Civil Service Commission in accordance with the civil-service law."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. ESCH), there were 107 ayes and 115 noes.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed as tellers the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 122 ayes and 129 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the indulgence of the committee. A few moments ago the Chair had to rule on a question of order of interest to every Member of the House, and with respect to which he had no opportunity to look up the precedents and cite same in connection with his ruling. The Chair since that time has found the following precedent which is precisely in point. The situation presented when the Chair made its ruling, was as follows:

The first paragraph in the section relating to the advisory tax board had been read without any objection, or point of order, or reservation of a point of order. An amendment was then offered to which a point of order was made. The point of order was overruled, and the gentleman from Illinois undertook to make a point of order to the original paragraph to which the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri had been offered. The Chair held that under the rules this motion came too late, briefly giving the reasons sustaining the ruling. The Chair now desires to put into the RECORD the following decision which is precisely in point:

On April 16, 1904, the general deficiency appropriation bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, when a paragraph of the bill was read providing for compensation to the clerk of the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions.

Mr. George W. Smith, of Illinois, proposed an amendment, which was ruled out on a point of order.

Thereupon Mr. Smith raised a question of order against the paragraph in the bill.

Mr. James A. Hemenway made the point of order that the question was raised too late.

The Chairman held that a point of order against a proposition must be made before an amendment is offered to it. (Hinds, vol. —, p. 6911.)

In the case cited the amendment was rejected on a point of order. In the case before the House the point of order to the amendment was overruled, and the amendment thereby held to be in order.

The committee will note that while the case cited is not so strong a case on the facts as the case upon which the Chair had occasion to rule, it fully sustains the ruling of the Chair to the effect that after an amendment is offered to a paragraph it is then too late to make a point of order to the paragraph to which that amendment relates.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1201. That the Secretary or the Commissioner may, and on the request of any taxpayer directly interested shall, submit to the board any question relating to the interpretation or administration of the internal-revenue laws, and the board shall report its findings and recommendations to the Secretary or the Commissioner, as the case may be.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment that I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 171, line 4, after the word "be," strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and to the taxpayer directly interested provided that no tax will be levied or collected or paid until after the board shall have returned its findings and recommendations.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment in justice to the small taxpayer. The law provides that each individual corporation shall at a certain time render a report of its income upon which it is taxed, which amount must be paid at a certain stated time. This bill creates a tax board for the purpose of adjusting any differences that may arise between the ruling of the commissioner and the opinion of the taxpayer. In other words, it provides a place where all disputes may be referred for adjudication. It seems to me that it is unfair to the taxpayer that he should be required to pay any amount which may be in dispute prior to the finding of that board. It is only just that the matter should be held in abeyance until the board has had time to render its ruling or decision.

As a concrete example, the cases I wish to touch are something like this, and I say this with all kindness in regard to the administration of previous laws. The internal-revenue collector has had an insufficient amount of money and has not been able to pay sufficient salaries to get the kind of men he should have sent out to examine the books of corporations.

I will state a concrete example. An adjuster or examiner was sent to a certain corporation to examine the books during the years 1911, 1912, 1913, and 1914. When he examined the books he made the claim that the concern had deducted more than the commissioner was willing to allow for depreciation in real estate. He explained that his instructions were that on real estate not over 2 per cent per annum should be deducted and that on machinery and equipment 10 per cent might be deducted. Under the laws of Pennsylvania, under the heading "Real estate," are included power plants, elevators, heating systems, blower systems, and everything that is not removable. This firm had kept its accounts in accordance with the term "real estate" as construed under the laws of Pennsylvania. Consequently a charging off of 2 per cent per annum was not sufficient to replace the machinery and power plant as it would wear out, all of which was admitted by the individual who was sent to the firm. But he said that his orders were positive and that he must see the books, that he must have book evidence. The firm had an abstract made of every bill that was paid, showing the amount of money invested in the boiler and the engine and the power plant and the heating plant, the elevators, and so forth; and if the rule as set down by the internal-revenue collector was applied upon those figures the firm had not exceeded in their deduction the amount allowed by the internal-revenue collector. Nevertheless the report was sent in and the firm received a bill for $400 for back taxes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KREIDER. At the present time we are by this bill establishing a board for the purpose of settling such disputes, and it seems to me it is reasonable that the matter should be held in abeyance until the board has had an opportunity to make a ruling upon the matter.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KREIDER. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. The great trouble there would be that every man paying taxes who wished to delay the payment of his tax would present a claim to that board and thus hold back a great deal of money that ought to be paid into the Treasury.

Mr. KREIDER. But this does not interfere with the making of the report or of the paying of the taxes. The firm or individual is compelled under the provisions of the law to make a report and pay the taxes without regard to this paragraph or title. This title only provides a court of equity, you might say, where disputed matters will be referred, and my amendment simply provides that we shall wait until that board renders its decisions before the interested taxpayer shall be compelled to pay this money over. It is the same now as if in the law when one individual sues another for $1,000 the law provided that immediately upon suit being brought the defendant must pay $1,000. The reasonable proposition would be to wait and find out whether he actually owed the $1,000 before he is compelled to pay it. That is all I intend to provide for in this amendment. Let us wait until we find that the taxpayer owes the money and then make him pay with interest.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KREIDER. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Of course, what the gentleman is referring to is the matter of back taxes.

Mr. KREIDER. Yes. The law provides that the individual or corporation must make return and must pay the taxes. It is only the amount which may arise in dispute, and which shall be held until such time as the board may find it possible to render a decision. I have spoken with the chairman of the committee several times, and he said that he would give the matter consideration, but he has been so extremely busy that I do not know whether he has reached the conclusion of the matter or not.

Mr. FORDNEY. I wish to say to the gentleman that I did not understand that he had in mind only that portion in dispute after the taxpayer had paid according to his own report.

Mr. KREIDER. Yes. This does not affect any part of the bill except this one particular portion of the bill which provides for this board.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I believe that the amendment offered by my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER] is a very important amendment, and that the committee ought to give careful consideration to it. In years gone by and right now these inspectors are going around after taxes have been paid, making searches of the books of corporations and also of individuals. We must assume that the average statement made by every individual or corporation is supposed to be a fair and honest statement of the condition of the books. An inspector comes in perhaps three years or four years afterwards and finds what he claims is a glaring error, on which he makes a report, and the tax is then assessed upon that basis, and you simply have no redress; there is no place to go to appeal the matter, and, if I understand what this new board is formed for, it will provide a place where a matter of that kind might be taken up and considered.

I think that the business men, the lawyers on this committee, and the committee itself ought to take cognizance of this amendment. I think it is an important thing. It costs nobody anything and gives the party who pays the tax and who believes he has a right to be heard an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment were adopted, it would be contrary to the whole practice and all regulations and laws that we have ever had relative to the collection of taxes. The amendment of the gentleman proposes that the taxpayer who disputes a proposition with a collector and who says, "I ought not to pay but so much taxes," which the collector says he must pay, may demand that the advisory board should hear and determine his case and make a report, and that the taxes in dispute shall not be collected until the advisory board makes its findings and report. There are three million and a few thousand individual tax returns. There are, I believe, now over 250,000, or about that many, corporations, and this is an opportunity for every taxpayer who has a dispute with the department as to the amount of taxes to demand that the matter must be reviewed by this board. Why, it would be 10 years before the board could make the findings in 10 per cent of the cases. Every case would be sent to this board, and in addition to this, the board has other duties, other matters connected with it that takes up its time. We provide in this bill that a man shall pay his taxes. If the tax collected is too much, it is refunded to him without any red tape at all. If it is not enough, he simply pays what has not been paid and no penalty at all.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman's amendment contemplates any such proposition as that. It simply contemplates that in case the inspector comes along two or three years or perhaps one year after the tax has been collected and paid and he finds what he claims is an error in the book, that too little has been paid, then there is a case for a reasonable dispute and the thing ought to go somewhere for adjustment.

Mr. KITCHIN. The amendment does not say that.

Mr. KREIDER. If the gentleman will just pardon me for a moment——

Mr. SNYDER. Of course, if the amendment does not bear that out, I do not understand what I am talking about.

Mr. KREIDER. If the gentleman will yield for one word, I would like to say that the provision requiring the rendering of a statement showing the income and payment thereon has nothing whatever to do either with this section, paragraph, or my amendment. That is the law and is separate and apart from this title. This title only provides for matters in dispute. If the representative of the revenue collector comes and has convinced the corporation that they were wrong there is nothing more to it, the tax is assessable, collected, and paid; but if in the case as I have stated the representative is without authority and simply comes there with an open and shut proposition and encounters a proposition which was not contemplated, he has no authority to settle that at all.

Mr. KITCHIN. As I understand, the gentleman's amendment is to section 1201.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. KREIDER. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. In such a case as has been stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, where the inspector comes along two or more years after the tax return has been made and the tax is paid, and finds that in his opinion a mistake has been made and not enough tax paid, there is an opportunity immediately for the taxpayer to appeal to this board before he pays his tax under existing law, is there not, I ask the chairman?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the taxpayer in such a case will have a reasonable opportunity to be heard.

Mr. FORDNEY. Can not he do that now?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; certainly.

Mr. KREIDER. In actual practice the revenue collector sends a notice demanding payment with a penalty of 50 per cent unless it is paid in 10 days.

Mr. KITCHIN. We provide for that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me say a word. When there is a tax-deposit item between the collector and the person——

Mr. KITCHIN. Or between the department and the collector.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Now, there are two ways open for the taxpayer. One is that he can pay the tax and ask for a refund; the other is, that he can file a claim for abatement and in that way hold his money until the case is heard by the board, and if there is merit in his claim he is not charged any license or any fee or any penalty.

Mr. SNYDER. I would like to ask the gentleman if he ever tried to do that?

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me read this. There is no difference in the construction——

Mr. SNYDER. When I made my statement, I will admit, I did not understand the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand.

We create an advisory board. Section 1201 defines its duties, namely:

That the Secretary or the commissioner may, and on the request of any taxpayer directly interested shall, submit to the board any question relating to the interpretation or administration of the internal-revenue laws, and the board shall report its findings and recommendations to the Secretary or the commissioner, as the case may be.

That is all the power that you give. Now, let us see the gentleman's amendment:

And to the taxpayer directly interested: Provided, That no tax shall be levied, collected, or paid until after the board shall have reported its findings and recommendations.

Now, in any question of dispute that arises between the taxpayer and the Government the commissioner shall at the request of the taxpayer submit it to this board, so that out of the 3,000,000 of individual taxpayers and 250,000 corporate taxpayers every one of those taxpayers can say to the commissioner, "My tax is wrong, and I request you to send it to the board." The board would have to find the facts and report them before the Government could collect any taxes. Gentlemen, the war would be over before 10 per cent of these questions could be decided by the board.

Mr. KREIDER. The gentleman is putting a wrong construction on it.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; that is the language.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KREIDER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1203. That the board shall have the power to summon witnesses, take testimony, administer oaths, and to require any person to produce books, papers, documents, or other data relating to any matter under investigation by the board. Any member of the board may sign subpœnas and members and employees of the Bureau of Internal Revenue designated to assist the board, when authorized by the board, may administer oaths, examine witnesses, take testimony, and receive evidence.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Page 171, line 20, after the word "evidence," insert the following new title:

"TITLE XIII.

"JOINT COMMITTEE ON WAR EXPENDITURES.

"SEC. 1204. That to cooperate with the President in promoting efficiency and preventing waste and extravagance in the conduct of the war with the Imperial Government of Germany a joint committee shall be appointed, composed of six Members of the Senate, including three Democrats and three Republicans, and seven Members of the House of Representatives, including three Republicans and four Democrats, to be known as the joint committee on war expenditures. The membership of such committee for the Senate shall be designated by the President of the Senate and for the House of Representatives by the Speaker thereof. Such committee shall sit during the sessions or the recesses of Congress, shall confer and advise with the President of the United States and the heads of the various executive departments on any or all matters relating to war expenditures, and shall make report to Congress from time to time, in its own discretion or when requested to do so by either branch of Congress. Such committee shall have power to act by subcommittee or otherwise and to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to employ such clerical expert and stenographic assistance as shall be necessary, and to pay the necessary expense of such committee there is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $100,000, to be paid out upon the audit and order of the chairman or acting chairman of said committee."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that. If the gentleman desires me to reserve it, I will reserve it for five minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wish the gentleman would reserve it. I want to be heard on the point of order also.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this is substantially the same amendment that was offered to the third liberty-loan bill. It contemplates, as indicated, the appointment of a joint committee on expenditures to cooperate with the President and the executive departments with a view to facilitating the war and checking extravagance and waste.

A great deal has been said—and it is fortunate for our country, perhaps, that so little has been said—but a great deal has been said in this House and in some of the newspapers of the country, with respect to the manner in which the money that has been appropriated for war purposes is dispensed. The demand for appropriations is constantly increasing. We have the word of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that it may be necessary to raise $2,000,000,000 in excess of the $8,000,000,000 contemplated by this bill, and, if public announcements are to be believed it may be necessary to raise a total of upward of $7,000,000,000 in addition to this $8,000,000,000.

Now, if this $8,000,000,000 is going to be a heavy tax, and it undoubtedly will be a tax that will pinch the people of the United States, it seems judicious, at least, on the part of Congress to do what it can to cooperate with the President to prevent what he certainly would want to avoid, to wit, extravagance and waste in the expenditure of these public moneys. The Federal Trade Commission has recently submitted a report or reports indicating that there has been profiteering, and we have much higher authority for that. The Secretary of the Treasury has made that statement broadly and squarely to the Committee on Ways and Means and in various communications to the chairman of that committee. The President of the United States, the very highest authority of all, stated to this House that there was profiteering, that it was known, and that there was ample evidence of it.

Now, why Congress should hesitate to offer its service to the President to checkmate profiteering and to prevent possible waste and extravagance I do not know. Certainly it is no mark of disrespect to the President to make the tender, and that is what this amendment contemplates.

It is true that when this amendment was offered before the President caused to be made public an announcement that he disapproved of a committee on war control. I do not know whether he fully understood that what was contemplated here was only a committee on war expenditures. He did object to a committee on war control and cited, if I recall correctly, the instance of the appointment of a committee during the Civil War, which committee was said to have embarrassed the immortal Lincoln, although that has been denied and there is evidence to show that that committee served a useful purpose.

That committee, however, went into the matter of impeachment of officers and attempted to change those who had control of the war; it actually went into the field in many instances and interfered with matters that were pending and subject to Executive direction. It did not confine itself to matters of expenditure, as is here proposed. Therefore, it may have tended to embarrass the war procedure, although this is not admitted.

If it is true that we have wasted vast sums of money, on aviation, for instance, and $640,000,000 has been mentioned; that certainly was the amount we appropriated, and very little resulted from it, if the evidence of the Senate investigating committee is to be accepted; if it is true that we have lost or wasted or that there has strayed or been stolen any part of that $640,000,000, a most tremendous sum, equal to the ordinary expenses of this Government in peace times, we ought to have some cooperative check on the part of Congress that raised it to the use of other appropriations of the kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. GARNER. Is the point of order reserved?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I made the point of order and reserved it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlemen for having listened to me thus far. There is a lot I would like to say on the merits, but I shall have to ask now to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand that the point of order is made?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I assume that the ground of the point of order is that it is not germane?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, on February 27, 1915, there was up for discussion in the House an amendment on all fours with this—an amendment to the District of Columbia appropriation bill. It provided for the appointment of a joint select committee to consist of Senators and Representatives to be appointed by the Presiding Officer of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, and the language of that amendment has been followed in substance, and very largely in words, in the amendment that I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moved the adoption of that amendment, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], who is a recognized parliamentarian in the House, opposed it upon the ground that it was not germane. He made strong argument against the amendment on that ground. It was debated at some length. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and others participated, and when the debate was concluded the Speaker, Mr. Speaker CLARK, said:

The question of whether it is new legislation would have applied originally, but it does not apply in this situation, and the Holman rule has nothing to do with the amendment. In the opinion of the Chair, the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] contains a proposition which is germane, and therefore the point of order raised by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] is overrured.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. That was on an appropriation bill, was it not?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That was the District of Columbia appropriation bill; yes.

Mr. GARNER. And this is a revenue bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; this is a revenue bill.

When the loan bill was before the House, September 6, 1917, last year, little more than a year ago——

The CHAIRMAN. What bill was that?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. One of the liberty-loan bills, a revenue bill, coming from the Committee on Ways and Means. At that time I offered the identical amendment which is now at the Clerk's desk, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] made the point of order that it was not germane. The Speaker pro tempore was the gentleman from New York [Mr. Fitzgerald], an acknowledged parliamentarian, and to him the gentleman from Pennsylvania said:

I do not desire to argue the point of order further than to say that this amendment conforms in form and substance to an amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the District of Columbia appropriation bill when the half-and-half question was before the House, and that the Speaker of the House, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], held that amendment to be germane.

Whereupon the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. Fitzgerald, said:

So that there may be no misunderstanding in the future as to the ruling of the Chair, the Chair desires to state that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is strictly accurate in his assertion that in form the amendment corresponds to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the District appropriation bill some years ago. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama, however, was an amendment to a Senate amendment which was pending to a bill which originated in the House, and the same rule is not applicable in determining the question of germaneness under such circumstances as is applicable under existing circumstances.

Now up to the point of discovering that the bill before the House was a Senate bill, and that the amendment was to that, Speaker pro tempore Fitzgerald entirely agreed with the gentleman from Pennsylvania as to the appropriateness of the ruling of Mr. Speaker CLARK declaring the District of Columbia amendment germane. The only point of difference was and the only reason apparently justifying the ruling of the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. Fitzgerald, at that time was that—

The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama, however, was an amendment to a Senate amendment which was pending to a bill which originated in the House, and the same rule is not applicable in determining a question of germaneness under such circumstances as is applicable under existing circumstances.

That was the reason for ruling against the amendment at that time, that it was an amendment to a Senate amendment; but that does not apply in the present instance, and I feel that we can fall back upon the ruling that Mr. Speaker CLARK made in the matter of the District of Columbia bill and can apply it to the revenue bill, since that is a House bill and acceptable under the conditions laid down by the Speaker pro tempore. My point is, Mr. Chairman, that it is germane, it being an amendment not to a Senate amendment but to a revenue bill in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. In the case cited by the gentleman did not Chairman Fitzgerald state that only the fact that it was an amendment to the Senate amendment rendered it germane?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The ruling of Mr. Fitzgerald was, in effect, that he did not sustain the ruling of Mr. Speaker CLARK, concerning which he said the recollection of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was entirely accurate, because the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was an amendment to a Senate amendment, which is not now the case.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not quite follow the gentleman just there. The Chair has the impression from what the gentleman has read that it was the opinion of Mr. Chairman Fitzgerald that the reason upon which the ruling of Mr. Speaker CLARK was based was that it was germane to a Senate amendment, and had it not been germane to a Senate amendment, had it been offered as an original proposition in the House, then the opinion of Mr. Fitzgerald was that it would not have been in order under the rules of the House. That is the impression that the Chair has.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can only repeat that in opening his ruling Mr. Fitzgerald said:

So that there may be no misunderstanding in the future as to the ruling of the Chair, the Chair desires to state that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is strictly accurate in his assertion that in form the amendment corresponds to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the District appropriation bill some years ago. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama, however, was an amendment to a Senate amendment which was pending to a bill which was originated in the House, and the same rule is not applicable in determining the question of germaneness under such circumstances as is applicable under existing circumstances.

The CHAIRMAN. In the case from which the gentleman has read, the case in which he offered the amendment to the liberty bond bill, the point of order was sustained by the Speaker pro tempore?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The point of order was sustained by Mr. Fitzgerald, Speaker pro tempore.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). The Chair is prepared to rule. The Chair does not think it is necessary to go into any elaborate statement. Even if it were not for the provision contained in clause 3 of Rule XXI, the Chair does not think that the amendment would be in order.

The present occupant of the chair had the honor of presiding as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole when the amendment was proposed to create a tariff commission as a part of a revenue bill. The point of order was made, and the Chair held generally that the meaning of the expression "germaneness" under the facts that were then presented was that the fundamental purpose of the amendment must be germane to the fundamental purpose of the bill.

Subsequently, when the matter reached the House the Speaker of the House, in a more elaborate and better reasoned ruling than the one delivered by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, sustained that ruling and held that that amendment was out of order because it was not germane. Under that general principle the Chair would certainly be of the opinion that this would not be in order. But if there should be any possible question about that, then the provision of clause 3, Rule XXI, which has been several times quoted to-day, providing that "no amendment shall be in order to any bill affecting the revenue which is not germane to the subject matter in the bill; nor shall any amendment to any item of such bill be in order which does not directly relate to the item to which the amendment is proposed," would certainly apply in this case. The matter contained in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania has no relation whatever to the raising of revenue in any form. Both under the general rule and under the special provision of clause 3, Rule XXI, the Chair is of the opinion that it is not germane, but is clearly out of order, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

(c) There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the sum of $7,500,000 for the expenses of assessing and collecting the internal-revenue taxes as provided in this act, including the employment of necessary officers, attorneys, experts, agents, inspectors, deputy collectors, clerks, janitors, and messengers, in the District of Columbia and the several collection districts, to be appointed as provided by law, telegraph and telephone service, rental and repair of quarters, postage, and the purchase of such supplies, equipment, mechanical devices, printing, stationery, law books and books of reference, and such other articles as may be necessary for use in the District of Columbia and the several collection districts: Provided, That not more than $2,750,000 of the total amount appropriated by this section may be expended in the Bureau of Internal Revenue, in the District of Columbia.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to line 23, page 172, striking out the clause "as provided by law" and inserting the following:

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 172, line 23, after the word "appointed," strike out the words "as provided by law" and insert "From lists of eligibles to be supplied by the Civil Service Commission and in accordance with the civil-service law."

Mr. GARNER. That is exactly what the law now provides for. The statute now provides that they shall be selected under the civil-service laws.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Texas is mistaken. I am glad to know that the gentleman from Texas will support the amendment I have offered, because he admits that he intends to have the income-tax inspectors, deputy collectors, revenue agents, and the like, for which an appropriation is carried amounting to $7,500,000, under the civil-service law.

This matter received the consideration of the subcommittee on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill at the present session. Under that bill for the current year we grant to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue the huge amount of $15,000,000 for the employment of deputy collectors, income-tax inspectors, revenue agents for the enforcement of these revenue-collecting laws. It was called to our attention at that hearing that there has been grave abuse by the present collectors of internal revenue in evading the civil-service requirements of the law. I measure my words carefully when I make that charge. Under the existing law the collectors of the respective districts, some 64 in number, are privileged to appoint deputy collectors without any requirements of the civil-service regulations. Then what takes place? Although the existing law requires the income-tax inspectors to be appointed by the civil-service law, the present commissioner authorizes the collectors in their respective districts to appoint deputy collectors without any requirement of civil-service regulations, and then immediately, or in a short time thereafter, permits them to be transferred upon examination into this classification of income-tax inspectors.

Gentlemen, it has been said that politics is adjourned, and I do not care how much of a partisan you may be, I believe you men on this side believe in the necessity at the present time of having these men who are going to be required to see that the full amount of these income taxes and war-profit taxes, and excess-profits taxes is collected in the country should be men of such character that will bring the full amount to the National Treasury.

The most efficient way that can be done is to have efficient men to do it. We know there is a shortage of labor throughout the country. We know that men who are capable to perform this work will not receive the appointment unless they have the privilege and opportunity of making application in a formal way to the Civil Service Commission and their merit determined by the Civil Service Commission. The commissioners testified that they have an ample number on the eligible list of income-tax inspectors to fill these places.

I am not saying that the men now employed in the service, for which $7,500,000 is at the disposal of the revenue collectors for appointment of spoilsmen to fill positions, shall be required to take civil-service examinations. I say that the $7,500,000 you are now providing shall be expended only by the employment of efficient men and efficient accountants, who will perform the work in a creditable manner and see that 100 per cent of the amount individuals and corporations are required to pay will be paid, and then there will be no question whatever that the law will be properly administered.

I do not wish to criticize the present Commissioner of Internal Revenue, except as to the manner in which the field agents have been employed. He is a capable man; he is working reforms in the service; but I appeal to you, as a business proposition, that the need at this time is for expert men, men qualified as accountants, to go over these complicated books of account, and the only way I know that they will be qualified is by having them subjected to a civil-service examination. I hope that the gentleman from Texas will have the support of the gentlemen on his side and vote for this amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. What do the words in line 23, "as provided by law," mean if they do not mean to take them from the civil service?

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will look over the hearings upon the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, he will find that under the so-called Overman amendment, carried in one of the appropriation acts of two or three years back, deputy collectors who were not required to give bond to the collector were privileged to be appointed without regard to civil-service examination by the collector. That is in the hearings, and I can cite the gentleman to the page in the hearings on the bill last year where that is admitted by Mr. Roper himself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman referred to deputies being taken out from under the civil service by a certain bill. Deputies are taken from out of the civil service; there is no objection to that. The gentleman says that he has no objection to the deputies being taken out from under the civil service.

Mr. STAFFORD. I want the deputies brought into the civil service, because at present the law is evaded. Income-tax collectors, as shown by the hearings before our committee, are required to be appointed by the Civil Service Commission. How is it evaded? The commissioner authorizes the collector to appoint so many deputy collectors in the field service, and they in turn are appointed to the position of income-tax inspectors.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understood the gentleman to refer to these five deputy commissioners.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no. I am not seeking to apply it to them. I think the commissioner ought to have leeway to select whom he thinks fit, and in justice to the commissioner I wish to say that he has appointed to these higher responsible positions persons irrespective of politics.

Mr. KITCHIN. I want to say to the committee that I do not think the members of the Committee on Ways and Means oppose the gentleman's amendment, because it adds absolutely nothing to the bill. The bill provides that they shall be appointed as now provided by law. The law provides that they shall be appointed exactly as in the language offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin. It is just surplusage. It does not amount to anything, but if it will please the gentleman or satisfy anyone in the House, we can accept it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am sure that the members of the committee, at least upon this side, understood all of the time that this provision would work as the gentleman from Wisconsin desires.

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. So that I think really in justice to the committee, if the gentleman from North Carolina does not object, the words ought to be substituted so that there will be no question about it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Very well. We do not object. I just want to occupy two minutes or more to say something about this civil-service requirement. I want to ask every member of the committee, Democrats and Republicans, to jog his memory and see if I do not correctly state the proposition that I am undertaking to state. We had a vote awhile ago and some little appearance of a filibuster with respect to some civil-service amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], and it appeared that the Democrats were very much opposed and that our committee, especially, was very much opposed to putting these different employees, who were under discussion, under the civil service. I know that I have tried my best, and I think we have all succeeded in keeping out of this bill anything like partisan politics. We did in the committee. A question did come up under this title as to whether certain employees or officers or appointments should be taken out of the civil service and left to Mr. Roper or to the Treasury Department.

This very proposition right here, whether they shall be appointed as provided by law, came up. When that proposition came up it was discussed upon both sides of the table. One prominent member of the minority took the position that to get competent men to handle this enormous amount of work, to perform these onerous duties, with the civil-service lists exhausted and the commission now being compelled to make temporary appointments because they can not get them from the lists, and the fact that more than 3,000 new appointments must be made, it would be found impossible to get the proper men if we sought to get them under the civil service. More than one member of the minority took that position. Some of the Democrats took that position, and some of the Democrats took the other position, and I made this statement: "We have not yet had any partisan politics or any vote on party lines since the war was declared, and if you members of the minority, and you are the only ones going to decide that, think that we can get better service and that we can administer this law better by taking these officers and employees out from under the civil service and letting them be appointed by the Treasury Department, that goes in the bill, but if it is your decision that better men can be gotten and that they ought to be appointed from the civil-service lists, then that goes in the bill," and after some short consideration the minority members said that they thought the words "as provided by law" should go in the bill. No Democrat had one word to say. It was written in the bill. I think in justice to the committee on both sides I should make this statement, as it appeared some time this afternoon that our committee was trying to leave open a door in this bill to have partisan appointments. The language was put there by the minority members—that is, they decided it should go, requiring these officers and employees to be appointed under the civil-service law. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina has stated with substantial correctness what occurred in the committee. He was perfectly fair in this matter, as he always is, but it appears there is a slight misunderstanding in reference to this paragraph which I understand the gentleman has no objection to having corrected. I want to emphasize what the gentleman has said, that there has been no partisan discussion in the committee itself. In the committee room these matters were entirely banished—completely kept out. If there has been any appearance of it here to-day, it is not an echo of anything that occurred in the committee room, where those things were very scrupulously on both sides avoided in all of the discussions.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will; yes.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Does not the gentleman think the language of the bill means that they must be appointed under the civil-service rules?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is what I understood at the time it was before the committee.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I do not think it can mean anything else at all.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Wisconsin, who has made a careful study of these matters and has had up this matter before, says that under the law as it now stands there may be certain appointments——

Mr. STAFFORD. May I interrupt and read——

Mr. KITCHIN. One moment. We have been discussing it and had up the matter with Mr. Roper, and Mr. Roper says that there is no other construction to be put except that they must be appointed from the civil service. We do not object to the amendment. We will accept it in order to make it certain.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1303. (a) That there is hereby created a legislative drafting service under the direction of two draftsmen, one of whom shall be appointed by the President of the Senate, and one by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, without reference to political affiliations and solely on the ground of fitness to perform the duties of the office. Each draftsman shall receive a salary of $5,000 a year, payable monthly. The draftsmen shall, subject to the approval of the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, employ and fix the compensation of such assistant draftsmen, clerks, and other employees, and purchase such furniture, office equipment, books, stationery, and other supplies, as may be necessary for the proper performance of the duties of the service and as may be appropriated for by Congress.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against this paragraph.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will reserve the point of order for a few moments.

Mr. WALSH. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I was very glad to find in the bill the proposal that has just been read. In 1907, now a good many years ago, I offered a resolution in the following language:

The Speaker shall appoint a person learned in the law as clerk for the revision of bills, whose compensation shall be at the rate of $5,000 per annum, and who shall be removable for cause.

The duties of said clerk shall be to examine all bills and resolutions pending before standing or select committees, in Committee of the Whole House, or before the House, and after such examination to suggest to the committee or the Members of the House in charge of the proposed legislation such verbal or technical alteration as may secure a more definite and perfect expression of the purposes proposed, and a better arrangement and classification thereof. Said clerk shall also wait upon the House Members of conference committees and make similar suggestions upon matters of legislation pending before them, and shall be entitled to the privilege of the floor of the House.

Now, the proposal was based upon the existing rule of the House touching parliamentary law, and I was proposing to do for the substantive law of the Congress what is now done in the way of parliamentary law, and I suggested the appointment of a single clerk with the idea that as his usefulness grew upon the House he would be authorized subsequently to gather about him a corps of assistants. When I was a very new Member in this House I was appointed on the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and afterwards was a member of the joint committee of the House and Senate to codify the penal code and the judicial title. No man who had not done similar work could have any appreciation of the duplication of law that is upon the statute books, of the confusion of expression, of the looseness of terms, and of the resulting litigation that costs the citizens of this country many millions of dollars.

We are one of the few legislative bodies in the world that has not created some machinery for the perfecting of the style of legislation. The average Member of Congress has not always time to draft bills in such form as to clearly express meaning, and particularly is that true when amendments are offered in a hurry on the floor or are agreed to in conference when there is a rush for time. And yet a man possessing no more or not so much ability through practice will acquire a facility of expression and the use of uniform terms that will greatly aid in the direction of clarity and brevity. I know of no reform that will produce greater results than the one contemplated in the legislation proposed by the Committee on Ways and Means. And while I am not vain enough to believe that they were aware of the fact that some 11 years ago I pressed this matter and have, year after year, introduced a resolution, and on one or two occasions have gone before the Committee on Rules in regard to it, still I rejoice they share with me this view. Ordinarily I do not like legislation that is not directly germane put upon a bill of this magnitude. But it is highly important that we clarify and simplify our legislation. If I mistake not, the courts of this land are going to be busy for many years to come in construing the statutes that we now are passing.

I have never favored having any body created outside of Congress that would undertake to deal with the substance of what Congress enacts. I think some of the States have gone to the extreme in getting their advice as to what they should enact into law from persons other than the members of their legislative bodies. But the language proposed in the paragraph that has just been read does not look to that sort of help. It looks to the creation of a corps of assistants who will simply help in the style and will not undertake to determine the substantive matters involved in legislation. Unless we take some such step as this——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERLEY. Unless we adopt some such action as this we will drift along—because what is everybody's business is nobody's business—with the old, loose method, the slipshod method that has been pursued in the past. And I am quite sure that if we do adopt this provision, in the course of three or four years there will not be a man in either the House or the Senate that will want to see it done away with. Every man in this House to-day, as in the past, avails himself of the parliamentary knowledge obtainable from the parliamentary clerk at the Speaker's desk, and the House is greatly helped by the performance of these functions by a man trained in that special line. What is true there, and now recognized as essential, is infinitely more necessary and true in regard to substantive law. And I trust the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] will feel free to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I heartily agree with what the gentleman from Kentucky has said.

Gentlemen of the House will remember that there was some complaint with reference to the language used in the last revenue bill. I think those who have followed this bill closely have found it to be, whether they approve of the purposes of the provisions or not, a model of clearness and brevity. It is certainly superior to anything that the committee knows of in stating the excess-profit tax clearly and briefly, and in other respects I think the bill is drawn as clearly as it could possibly be expected. This is largely due to the fact that we had assistance of the character for which provision is to be made under the paragraph now before the committee. And now let me say at this time that I do not believe any Member of the House who has not participated in the drawing of a bill of this character has any idea of the difficulties which the committee meets in having the provisions of the bill expressed clearly and concisely. The minds of the committee are necessarily occupied with the policy of the provisions which are put in the bill; and in a case like this, where we have a bill imposing taxes to the amount of $8,000,000,000, we are sailing continually on uncharted and unknown seas, where no taxing power in this country ever ventured before, and the policy of these matters which we are incorporating into this bill naturally caused every member of the committee the greatest trouble and the greatest difficulty. A Member does not have the time which he would wish and the time that is really necessary to give to the form and expression of the bills in order to make them what they ought to be. If gentlemen knew, as some gentlemen doubtless do, having had experience with bills of similar character, the difficulty in getting the expressions perfectly clear and accurate and at the same time being sure that the policy which was desired by the committee is expressed, I am sure no objection would be made to this provision. I believe that there is no more important provision in the whole bill than the one which we now have before us.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. ELSTON. Is it contemplated that their services would be subject to the request of any committee only? I see they would not be subject to the request of any single member. I think services of that kind would be very useful to a Member who had the subject matter or the purpose of proposed legislation in mind, but he would have some difficulty in drafting a measure. What does the gentleman think of that?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That matter was given careful consideration by the committee, and the committee thought it best not to put in an express provision that the draftsmen must give their services to every Member, for fear that in the preparation of some 30,000 bills that come before the House, if provision were made that the draftsmen must give their services to every Member, they would be overwhelmed with requests of that kind, so that they could do nothing for the committees.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The general idea of this amendment has been in force in my own State of Vermont for years, and I think there the practice works out successfully. As I recall it now, when a member has prepared a bill it goes automatically to the committee on revision before it is finally introduced. There it is subjected to such changes in verbiage or diction as may be necessary to make it conform to the general statutory language that has been accepted and approved in times past and still made to conform to the ideas that the framer of the bill has in mind. Thereby the object suggested by the gentleman from California is practically accomplished also, because in that way the work of each member passes through the hands of that committee on revision, and in consequence changes that are needed are made.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] makes the point of order on the ground that this particular paragraph does not relate to the revenue or bonded debt and is, therefore, in excess of the jurisdiction of the committee.

Mr. WALSH. That it is not within the jurisdiction of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. I say, in excess of the jurisdiction of the committee, and therefore beyond their authority. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken, and sustains it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, no point of order was reserved on this bill. Take the case of an appropriation bill. You can not have new legislation on an appropriation bill when a point of order is reserved at the time the report is presented. If that is not done you can not do it when you consider the bill.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will examine the precedents he will find that one does not have to reserve a point of order on a revenue bill, and the only place where points of order must be reserved is on an appropriation bill.

Mr. GARNER. That is not the rule.

Mr. WALSH. That is the rule, and the precedents bear it out.

Mr. KITCHIN. As I understand it, Mr. Chairman, if we have a bill, although it may not be a revenue bill at all, but if we have jurisdiction of a bill and we consider the bill and report it, points of order can not be made against it, because all other committees that might have had jurisdiction have waived it in not demanding the transfer of jurisdiction.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will permit, this bill was not referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. It was brought in here under the privilege and dropped in the basket.

Mr. KITCHIN. The RECORD shows that it was referred.

Mr. WALSH. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The RECORD does not show that it was ever referred. The RECORD shows that the gentleman presented it, and that it was presented to the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a very important matter, and the Chair will make the following explanatory statement. Should a bill be erroneously referred, the rules provide the procedure by which that bill, as a whole, may be returned to the proper committee. If advantage is not taken in time of the rule, and the committee improperly in possession of the bill proceeds to consider it, and report the same to the House, it will then be too late to raise a point of order against the bill as a whole.

On such a case the committee entitled to jurisdiction is considered to have slept upon its rights. But when a bill is properly sent to a committee having jurisdiction over the subject matter, and it improperly includes in the bill reported to the House, matter not within its jurisdiction, then upon the consideration of the bill, the extraneous matter improperly included, can be objected to by a point of order. This is the first opportunity presented to object to the offending matter. Hence no one has slept on his rights and no one is estopped to make objection. There must be an opportunity afforded at some time to object to matter included in a bill in excess of the jurisdiction of a committee, and the first time that this opportunity is afforded, is when the bill is under consideration, and the objectionable matter is reached.

Mr. KITCHIN. I supposed that this referred to an amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, may I direct the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina to section 6926 of Volume V of Hinds' Precedents, where Speaker CANNON, of Illinois, on May 14, 1906, made the ruling that points of order are reserved at the time of reference to Committee of the Whole only on appropriation bills?

Mr. Joseph W. Babcock, of Wisconsin, moved that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills on the Union Calendar.

Mr. Sydney E. Mudd, of Maryland, interposed to reserve points of order against the bills.

Speaker CANNON held that as they were not appropriation bills such reservation was not called for.

Mr. KITCHIN. I want a little information, too, because this will be a precedent, and we want to get the matter straight. Suppose the Ways and Means Committee a week or two weeks before we reported this bill had introduced this identical bill with this provision in it, and then had reported it, and no points of order at all were reserved. Is it the understanding of the Chair that any matter in the bill of which the Ways and Means Committee originally had no jurisdiction would then be subject to points of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair in response to that question will read the following extract from the rules:

POWERS AND DUTIES OF COMMITTEES.

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows, viz: Subjects relating—

1. To the election of Members—to the respective Committees on Elections.

2. To the revenue and the bonded debt of the United States—to the Committee on Ways and Means—

And so on.

The latter provision fixes the jurisdiction of the Ways and Means Committee, and delimits the matter appropriate for its consideration. Suppose the Committee on Ways and Means should report a bill dealing with the bonded debt, and as one paragraph of same should include matter properly belonging to the Elections Committee, or to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, or to the Committee on Appropriations, or to any other committee, how would this illegal assumption of jurisdiction be reached, save by a point of order directed to the offending matter?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is true, if it sought to amend a bill so as to include matters of which it had no jurisdiction, because the amendment would not be germane to the bill. But I am speaking now of this case: Suppose we had introduced this bill two weeks ago, and the committee had reported it, and it came before the House with that identical proposition in it for the Drafting Service, not as an amendment, but as a part of the bill. Suppose we had reported the bill with that provision in it. Would it then be subject to a point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think it is a question of amendment at all. It is a question of there being in the bill reported by the committee matter as to which the committee had no jurisdiction at all. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken and that the reasons for the ruling are sound.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would like to ask what committee would have jurisdiction of this?

Mr. WALSH. The Committee on Rules.

Mr. KITCHIN. The Committee on Rules has no jurisdiction. The Committee on the Library has assumed jurisdiction and has had hearings on the bill.

Mr. WALSH. I contend that this could only be provided by statute, and not by amendment to the rules of the House.

Mr. KITCHIN. The Rules Committee could report a resolution to change the rules.

Mr. GARNER. The Rules Committee can come in and make any report that they want to. They have absolute power to report anything pertaining to the procedure of the House.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say that if a bill is introduced that does not belong to any committee, it is a common practice to appoint a special committee; but this bill never was introduced at all until the committee reported it, as I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(b) The drafting service shall aid in drafting public bills and resolutions or amendments thereto on the request of any committee of either House of Congress, but the Joint Committee on the Library may determine the preference, if any, to be given to such requests. The draftsmen shall, from time to time, prescribe rules and regulations for the conduct of the work of the service, subject to the approval of the Joint Committee on the Library.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes a point of order to the paragraph just read. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

(c) For the remainder of the current fiscal year there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the establishment and maintenance of the service, including the payment of salaries herein authorized.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1310. That in case of any overpayment or overcollection of any tax imposed by section 628 or 630 or by Title V, Title VIII, or Title IX, the person making such overpayment or overcollection may take credit therefor against taxes due upon any monthly return, and shall make refund of any excessive amount collected by him upon proper application by the person entitled thereto.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman a question about section 1308, where it provides for a fine. Ought there not to be a provision for a conviction by the court? I am speaking of section 1308—which I know we have passed—but there must be a conviction in court to precede any such action as provided for in that section.

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course, there must be a conviction, but that is covered by the general criminal statutes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1315. (a) That section 3220 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3220. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, subject to regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized to remit, refund, and pay back all taxes erroneously or illegally assessed or collected, all penalties collected without authority, and all taxes that appear to be unjustly assessed or excessive in amount, or in any manner wrongfully collected; also to repay to any collector or deputy collector the full amount of such sums of money as may be recovered against him in any court, for any internal revenue taxes collected by him, with the cost and expenses of suit; also all damages and costs recovered against any assessor, assistant assessor, collector, deputy collector, agent, or inspector, in any suit brought against him by reason of anything done in the due performance of his official duty."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 181, line 3, at the end of the section insert: "and shall make report to Congress at the beginning of each regular session of Congress of all transactions under this section."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not see any real objection to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1318. That whoever in connection with the sale or lease, or offer for sale or lease, of any article, or for the purpose of making such sale or lease, makes any statement, written or oral, (1) intended or calculated to lead any person to believe that any part of the price at which such article is sold or leased, or offered for sale or lease, consists of a tax imposed under the authority of the United States, or (2) ascribing a particular part of such price to a tax imposed under the authority of the United States, knowing that such statement is false or that the tax is not so great as the portion of such price ascribed to such tax, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $1,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if he does not consider that there should be an alternative penalty for the violation of this provision. It seems to me that the fine of $1,000 might not be severe enough. I wondered if it might not be amended to make it similar to the penalty imposed in section 3167, by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment for not more than one year or both.

Mr. KITCHIN. I see no objection to it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the period and adding the words "or by imprisonment not exceeding one year or both."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 188, line 2, after "$1,000" strike out the period and insert the following: "or by imprisonment not exceeding one year or both."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, on page 187, line 22, after the comma, I move to strike out the words "knowing that such statement is false or that the tax is not so great as the portion of such price ascribed to such tax." The language of the section is:

Ascribing a particular part of such price to a tax imposed under the authority of the United States, knowing that such statement is false or that the tax is not so great as the portion of such price ascribed to such tax, shall be guilty—

And so forth.

In other words, the Government will have to prove that the party making the statement knew that he was making a false statement.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the Government ought to.

Mr. SEARS. It would be, it seems to me, prima facie evidence when one made a statement that he knew what the tax was that he was making a false statement. If I state that I am raising the price of an article $2 because the war tax is $2, I shall be guilty of a misdemeanor if that tax is not as represented. Therefore why should we put the word "knowing" such statement was false.

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, a lot of clerks or selling agents do not always know the tax on the articles that they sell.

Mr. SEARS. I appreciate that; but under the last bill several merchants told me they had to charge a higher price because of the war tax. Moving pictures raised the price from 10 cents to 15 cents, as they said, on account of the tax, when the tax was not 5 cents.

Mr. KITCHIN. And they knew it was not 5 cents; but I do not think a party ought to be put in jail, as, for instance, the clerks, when they are selling an article upon which they do not know what the tax is.

Mr. SEARS. I take the position that the fellow ought to know what the tax is before he makes the statement; but, Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1319. That wherever by the laws of the United States or regulations made pursuant thereto any person is required to furnish surety or sureties on any bond, such person may, in lieu of surety or sureties, and under regulations prescribed by the Secretary, deposit with the United States an amount of bonds of the United States issued after April 24, 1917, equal to the amount of such bond, together with an agreement authorizing the United States to sell such bonds in case of any default in payment of the bond. As soon as the bond becomes void and of no effect, such bonds shall be returned to the depositor.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH: Page 188, line 13, after the word "depositor," insert the following: "And such bonds may be deposited and accepted as security for the issue of national bank currency the same as the bonds of the United States of a prior date.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, is it the proposition of the gentleman to issue currency upon the bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. As I gather it, the purpose is to deposit the liberty bonds instead of security bonds and have currency issued upon them.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman's amendment should be adopted, it would simply destroy the value of about $700,000,000 worth of 2 per cent bonds.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Perhaps the gentleman better hear my statement first. The object of this amendment and its effect, if adopted, will be to stimulate and encourage the approaching and much-advertised drive for the sale of liberty bonds and give to them an increased market value without in any manner injuring the revenues of the Government or interfering with the fixed property rights of any citizen. They are to bear 4¼ per cent interest, and with this amendment no outstanding Government bond will surpass them in earning capacity. Of course, the handicap of liability to certain taxation imposed by this act will remain, but this only affects their market value and desirability as an investment and is greatly beneficial to the Government as a source of revenue.

The value of this amendment is easily calculated from the current commercial values of the different issues of Government bonds as shown by stock-exchange quotations.

The following clipping from a city daily of this morning shows their relative values:

GOVERNMENT BONDS.

U. S. 2s, registered (bid)	98
U. S. 2s, coupon (bid)	98
U. S. liberty 3½s	100.18
U. S. liberty first 4s	96.64
U. S. liberty second 4s	95.94
U. S. liberty first 4¼s	96.68
U. S. liberty second 4¼s	95.94
U. S. liberty third 4¼s	96
U. S. 4s, registered (bid)	106½
U. S. 4s, coupon (bid)	106½

It will be noted that the nontaxable bonds are quoted much higher than those subject to taxation, much higher than those exempted from such burden. The nontaxable 2s are quoted at 98, the 3½s at 100.18, and the 4s at 106.50, an average of from 5 to 10 points higher than the taxable list. By what strange manipulation or basis of calculation can these nontaxable 2s be made to sell at 98 when taxable 4¼s only bring 96 in the same market? The natural and ready answer is the liability of one for taxation and not of the other. But this does not suffice as an explanation. The difference is too great to be accounted for in this way. This is apparent on the face of the quotations.

What, then, is the cause? The security back of each is the same—the entire resources of the Government and the patriotic impulses of an honest and just citizenship.

How can this inequality be remedied? My answer is by the adoption of the amendment I have proposed.

Either by the law itself or by some ruling of the Comptroller of the Currency only the 2s and the earlier 4s are accepted as basic security for national-bank currency. All other Government issues are discredited. Even the nontaxable 3½s are refused as such security by the Government itself.

Any group of citizens desiring to engage in national banking must, before they can obtain circulating currency from the Government, go into the open market and purchase these favored 2s or 4s, paying exorbitant premiums therefor, to deposit with the Government as security. Liberty bonds will not do; like certain registrants under the selective-draft law, they are put in a deferred classification, although worth two points more in the open market than the 2s, and yet the cry of pro-Germanism and unpatriotic citizenship has already been mildly hinted at against any who may hesitate to buy liberty bonds at the coming drive.

Why is this? Who gets the benefit of this enforced discrimination in favor of these favored bonds? Not a penny of advantage goes to the Government, or there might be some excuse for it. Does it go to the people generally? No. Existing national banks and nontaxpaying bondholders of long standing are the only possible beneficiaries of this covert assault on our liberty bonds. They, of course, are loth to have their strangle hold of monopoly loosened.

I favor the removal of every restriction, except that of taxation, on the sale of liberty bonds. Tax them, yes; tax them heavily if need be, but give them a clear credit bill of health and the people will do the balance without much special urging when the next liberty-loan drive starts.

My amendment seeks only this.

I think liberty bonds, especially when presented to the Government for any proper purpose or for security, should not be discriminated against. They are backed not only by the entire resources of the Government, but by the united, patriotic impulses of a great liberty-loving people. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hardly thinks the amendment is in order.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word or two upon that.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, this section was read through just as in another holding to-day, and no point of order was made against it or reserved. Then came my amendment. Then came points of order. I appeal to the Chairman who rendered the other decision to render a similar one here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not hold that the gentleman is not in order in offering his amendment. He is in order in offering the amendment, and the Chair recognized him for that purpose; but the point of order is made that this amendment is not in order under subsection 3 of Rule XXI. The contents of the bill are entirely different from what is proposed to be done by the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. HOLLINGSWORTH. This particular section provides that certain bonds issued after a certain date shall be accepted by the Government for a certain purpose. I submit that we are dealing with bonds and how they may be used.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman is perfectly clear, and the Chair does not undertake to say that it may not be wholesome legislation, but it is not in order upon this bill, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I have a committee amendment which I desire to offer at this time, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 188, line 11, after the period, insert: "In the discretion of the official having authority to approve the bond such bonds may be deposited with a Subtreasury, Government depository, Federal reserve bank, or member bank, which shall issue its receipt therefor, describing the bonds deposited."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 173, section 1303-A, and I ask unanimous consent further that the point of order made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and the ruling of the Chair thereon be vacated, so that the section shall stand.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to return to page 173, section 1303. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina now asks unanimous consent that the proceedings in relation to the same, the point of order to the section, and the ruling of the Chair may be vacated. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I understand that the chairman had one or two amendments to offer to subsection (b).

Mr. KITCHIN. I am making that request with the understanding that these amendments will be offered.

Mr. WALSH. As committee amendments?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Still further reserving the right to object, because the demand for the regular order was made, I had no opportunity to express my reasons for opposing the provisions of these three sections. I shall not object to the request of the gentleman, as I understand he had some committee amendments to offer which will meet the objections I had to the provisions as printed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina that the action heretofore taken in respect to this section shall be vacated? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 174, line 7, after the word "requests," insert "of the committees of either House, respectively."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, there is an amendment before that.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have them all right here.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following several amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers the following amendments, which will be reported seriatim by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 174, lines 5 and 6, after the word "but," in line 5, strike out the words "the Joint Committee on the Library" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "the Library Committee of the Senate and the Library Committee of the House of Representatives, respectively."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 174, line 9, after the word "service," insert "for the committees of each House."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 174, line 10, strike out line 10 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "the Library Committee of each House, respectively."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 174, at the end of line 10, insert the following: "One-half of all appropriations for the service shall be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate and one-half by the Clerk of the House of Representatives."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1402. That the revenue act of 1916 is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof a section to read as follows:

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It may be crudely done, but at this point and because the bill is so nearly finished, as a member of the Ways and Means Committee minority who has been in attendance for more than three months in association with the gentleman from North Carolina and the other members of the Committee on Ways and Means, I think it proper to say that never within my recollection as a Member of this House for the past 12 and more years has such expedition been made in the House upon a great bill as has been made upon this. The record, for which credit must be given chiefly to the gentleman from North Carolina, is exceptional. Personally I wish to pay tribute to his very great courtesy to me as a member of this committee during these long and trying months, even when at times I disagreed with him. I would feel myself doing an injustice to the personal sentiment I entertain for him and for his colleagues upon the committee if I did not now, as one member of the minority, make this public acknowledgment of his earnestness, his assiduity, and his patriotic desire to render a great public service. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12863, the revenue bill, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

FOURTH LIBERTY BOND ISSUE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 12923) to supplement the second liberty-bond act, for the purpose of disagreeing with Senate amendments and agreeing to the conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 12923, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference.

Mr. GILLETT. What is the bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. The bond bill we had up and passed the other day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 12923. An act to supplement the second-liberty bond act as amended, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair appoints the following conferees:

The Clerk read as follows:

Messrs. KITCHIN, HENRY T. RAINEY, DIXON, FORDNEY, and MOORE of Pennsylvania.

STIMULATION OF AGRICULTURE (H. R. NO. 796).

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. By the authority of the Committee on Agriculture and at the direction of the committee I report back to the House the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products" for printing under the rules.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to reserve all points of order on the bill.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask unanimous consent that on Saturday next, after the reading of the Journal and disposition of business on the Speaker's table, that I may be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] asks unanimous consent that on Saturday, after the reading of the Journal and disposition of business on the Speaker's table, he may be allowed to address the House for 30 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, after the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] finishes his speech on Saturday, I may be permitted to address the House for 45 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that on Saturday, at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, he be permitted to address the House for 45 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Reserving the right to object, which I do not intend to do, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Mississippi, who has just reported this agricultural-extension bill, when it is the intention of the Committee on Agriculture to call it up for consideration in the House?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. It is the purpose of the committee, probably, to call it up at the conclusion of this bill, but that has not been fully determined. We want to accommodate both sides of the House.

Mr. DYER. You will not have it up on Saturday?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I do not think so, unless it will be satisfactory to both sides. We want, of course, to dispose of the bill as soon as we can.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, September 20, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi, from the Committee on Agriculture, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agriculture products," reported the same with Senate amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 796), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12872) making certain officers of the Army eligible for appointment as chief of staff corps and departments, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 794), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SIMS, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12776) to provide further for the national security and defense and for the more effective prosecution of the war by furnishing means for the better utilization of the existing sources of electrical and mechanical power, and for the development of new sources of such power, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 795), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado: A concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 52) extending the thanks of Congress to the American Army, Navy, and marines and the women in the medical and other auxiliary work for their heroic services in the present war; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. EMERSON: A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 327) to extend thanks of Congress to Gen. Pershing and our soldiers; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BURNETT: A resolution (H. Res. 431) providing for the consideration of H. J. Res. 331; to the Committee on Rules.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ALEXANDER: A bill (H. R. 12965) granting a pension to John A. Neff; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 12966) granting an increase of pension to Aquilla Williams; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. AUSTIN: A bill (H. R. 12967) granting a pension to Jane Roberts; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BRUMBAUGH: A bill (H. R. 12968) granting an increase of pension to Nettie Avery; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CARTER of Massachusetts: A bill (H. R. 12969) granting a pension to Adoniram J. Edwards; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12970) granting a pension to Thomas Casey; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GALLAGHER: A bill (H. R. 12971) granting an increase of pension to Annie M. Wood; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. IRELAND: A bill (H. R. 12972) granting a pension to Maria L. Gill; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12973) granting an increase of pension to Mary L. Taylor; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SANFORD: A bill (H. R. 12974) granting an increase of pension to George A. Hitchcock; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TIMBERLAKE: A bill (H. R. 12975) granting an increase of pension to Ann E. McGrew; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ESCH: Resolution of the Anchorage Chamber of Commerce, Anchorage, Alaska, urging prompt assistance by the Government in the Alaskan coal fields; to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: Petition of Charles L. Craig, comptroller of the city of New York, opposing taxation of income from municipal securities; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of citizens of Peru, Ill., favoring the Edmonds bill (H. R. 5531) to provide a Pharmaceutical Corps in the Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LINTHICUM: Petition of Charles L. Craig, comptroller of the city of New York, opposing the proposed tax on municipal securities; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. RAKER: Petition of H. W. Law, of San Francisco, Cal., against the tax on nonbeverage alcohol; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, September 20, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We would worship Thee, our Father in heaven, by fulfilling every duty Thou hast laid upon us with grace and fortitude.

We thank Thee for the fine sense of patriotism displayed by the Members of the Congress of the United States from the beginning of hostilities in their earnest desire to furnish ways and means to prosecute the war which has been thrust upon us by a cruel people; for the manifestation of that patriotism in the individual sacrifices of a number of its Members who have gone from their positions as statesmen to give themselves to their country as warriors to face the hardships and dangers incident to the life of a soldier.

We thank Thee for the Member who will leave us to-day for the duties devolving upon the soldier. His has been a strenuous life, strong in his convictions, firm in his duty, a conspicuous worker on the floor of this House. We part with him reluctantly, but bid him Godspeed in his patriotic service.

Comfort his wife and children and spare him to them and us. In Christ's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE TO-MORROW.

The SPEAKER. The Chair designates the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] to preside to-morrow.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wisconsin rise?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. We will dispose of certain little matters first.

Mr. FORDNEY rose.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Michigan rise?

Mr. FORDNEY. I want to ask general leave to print. I want to ask for general leave to print speeches on the revenue bill for five days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that everybody shall have permission to print speeches in the RECORD for five legislative days after the conclusion of the revenue bill.

Mr. GILLETT. To be confined to the bill, of course?

The SPEAKER. Yes; to be confined to the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

READMISSION OF ENLISTED ALIENS.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD House joint resolution 331 and the report on the same. It is a resolution for the readmission of aliens who have enlisted in the armies of our cobelligerents. We passed a resolution some time ago permitting resident aliens who enlist in our armies to be readmitted, and the President, the State Department, and the Department of Labor are very anxious that the scope of the resolution be enlarged so as to permit the readmission of those who have enlisted in the armies of our cobelligerents if they go over there and are crippled or fall into bad health. Under the general immigration law they can not be readmitted here.

The SPEAKER. What is the number of the resolution?

Mr. PURNETT. It is House joint resolution 331. I desire to have it printed in the RECORD for the information of Members.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD House joint resolution 331.

Mr. GILLETT. I can not see any advantage in printing this resolution in the RECORD. I object to it.

Mr. BURNETT. It is desired by the State Department that its passage be expedited. I do this preliminary to asking that it may be considered by unanimous consent next Monday. I am not asking for its passage now. I have asked for a rule to expedite its passage.

Mr. GILLETT. I understood under the program that there would not be a quorum here next Monday.

Mr. BURNETT. I do not want to interfere with any arrangements that have been made, but it is very important that this resolution be passed speedily because of the treaties that have just been consummated. Some little irritation has resulted from the desire on the part of enlisted aliens of cobelligerent countries to return to the armies of those countries, and in case they desire to return here we should readmit them if they become invalided or disabled while serving in the Army.

Mr. GILLETT. I am in sympathy with the purpose of the resolution, but I will object for the present.

Mr. BURNETT. I am not asking that the House act on it now. I make this request in order that Members may inform themselves, so that we can expedite it later.

Mr. GILLETT. The Members can get the report on the resolution at any time. I object for the present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. TILLMAN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Arkansas rise?

Mr. TILLMAN. I rise to ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks to-morrow afternoon to be made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] and by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], I may have 45 minutes in which to address the House on the subject of the conditions as I saw them recently on the Piave and French fronts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], he may have 45 minutes in which to address the House touching his observations and experiences while in Europe recently. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMS. Reserving the right to object, I want to say to the gentleman that I wish to submit a unanimous-consent request for the emergency power bill to be taken up and considered by the House following the consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill, and it is an extremely important bill and a very urgent war measure.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. I object.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objects.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman withhold his objection until we can understand what the program of procedure is?

The SPEAKER. The program of procedure is that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] to-morrow has 30 minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] 45 minutes, and the gentleman from Arkansas is asking 45 minutes more, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] objects.

Mr. TILLMAN. He did not object to my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objects.

Mr. KITCHIN. He objected to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee was not asking for anything.

Mr. DYER. I withdraw my objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire of the gentleman from North Carolina, in view of the many requests for leave to speak to-morrow, whether it is the program to take up any further business after to-day's business?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman and to the House that what I have in mind is that very shortly we will finish the consideration of the revenue bill. There are only two amendments to be considered.

Mr. GILLETT. There is only one speech of 15 minutes to-day.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], I understand. Then, after that, we are to take up the Agricultural appropriation bill and also the agricultural extension bill, which includes the question of prohibition.

Mr. EMERSON. That is to-day?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is to-day. Probably more Members will be here to-day than at any other time, because most of them have come in to vote on the revenue bill. Then we hope that certainly next week we can finish all the other legislation that is necessary or urgent, and after that enter into some kind of a gentleman's agreement similar to that which we had last month for three-day adjournments, with no business to be transacted, until the Senate votes on the revenue bill or is ready to vote upon it.

Mr. SIMS. But, Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman considered this emergency power bill in any shape whatever?

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman from Tennessee will permit me, I said the urgent legislation. We hope to finish all urgent legislation.

Mr. SIMS. But the gentleman did not mention this in connection with his hope.

Mr. KITCHIN. I did not mention any particular bill.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman mentioned the Agricultural bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is to-day.

Mr. SIMS. Now, I am asking unanimous consent that this emergency power bill be taken up following the Agricultural bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have no objection; not a bit. I will be candid with the gentleman. If that is an administration war measure, and the administration thinks it is urgent and important, I have no doubt that the House will pass that promptly next week.

Mr. SIMS. The administration has been urging it for six weeks; that is, to get it reported as soon as possible. And I will say that there is no use of building ships or of appropriating money for the manufacture of ammunition if we can not get the power to manufacture the ships, the ammunition, and other things to be carried over in the ships.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am glad that the committee after six weeks' time are ready to report it.

Mr. SIMS. It has been reported and is now on the calendar, and I want to ask permission to take it up following the Agricultural bills.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Tennessee and I do not differ at all. As I said, if it is an administration measure—and the gentleman says it is—and it is——

Mr. SIMS. I do, most emphatically. The gentleman need not put in any "if."

Mr. KITCHIN. I agree with the gentleman that it is an administration war measure.

Mr. SIMS. And with a unanimous report in its favor.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman's bill is certainly included in what I have said, because it is an urgent war measure.

Mr. WALSH. I will ask the gentleman what committee reported that bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. GARNER. When we get through with the legislation, I think every one here is interested in the possibility of the membership going home. If we could to-day pass the Agricultural appropriation bill, which I understand only involves the question of eliminating the wheat proposition, which the President vetoed on that account——

Mr. KITCHIN. That is correct.

Mr. GARNER. And if we could send the supplemental Agricultural bill to conference, then outside of the emergency legislation, such as we have heard spoken of a moment ago, Members might be able to go home to-morrow; and after the really important matters that may be disposed of to-day are out of the way Members might get away for an indefinite leave, of their own accord.

Mr. SIMS. I will protest against any understanding of that kind until the emergency power bill is acted on by the House.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the House will just be in order, I will come to an understanding with the gentleman from Tennessee. He must understand that I do not exclude his bill at all. I think his bill is important and will have to be passed. I am simply saying that my hope is that we will pass the two bills which I have mentioned to-day, the Agricultural appropriation bill and the Agricultural extension bill, and then next week——

Mr. GARNER. Take up all these other things.

Mr. KITCHIN. We will take up these important urgent war measures—and the gentleman's measure is one of them. In fact, that is the only one I now know of, and certain other legislation that is important which is on the unanimous-consent calendar. I think we ought to have a day to consider such bills, and possibly a day for private bills, if we can get the time.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman expect that the military appropriation bill will be before the House also?

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman means the deficiency bill?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand from the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHEELEY], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], ranking minority member of that committee, that in all probability it will be 10 days or two weeks before that will be ready to be reported.

Mr. GILLETT. At least two weeks.

Mr. KITCHIN. And I see no necessity for the Members, unless they want to stay for other purposes, to stay here for that purpose, because we all know that if the War Department declares that it is absolutely necessary, important and urgent that we have $5,000,000,000 or $6,000,000,000 or $7,000,000,000, and the Appropriations Committee after full hearing and investigation agree with the War Department and report the bill, we know that no Member of the House is going to oppose it, and I see no reason why the Members should stay here for that bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Finance Committee of the Senate will consume more than two months' time before reporting the revenue bill back to the Senate, and I ask the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, the Democratic leader, is there no hope of Congress adjourning when these most important bills which the gentleman has just mentioned are out of the way, and come back here about the 1st of December and pass the new revenue bill in the Senate?

Mr. KITCHIN. If it is clear that the Senate will consume at least two months—and I agree with the gentleman from Michigan that it looks as though it will consume two months—I see no reason why we could not adjourn and come back here about the 1st of December.

Mr. GARNER. It all takes the consent of the Senate.

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. GILLETT. In mapping out the program which the gentleman from Tennessee thinks is so important, is it not wise to take into view the possibility of these bills going through the Senate? We know that the Senate is not going to take these bills up in the remaining days of this session.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the chairman of the Shipping Board, the chairman of the War Industries Board—every member of the administration except the President himself—has urged the immediate consideration of this bill, because it contemplates the increase of the existing power plants, some of which can be done in three months, some in six months, some requiring longer time, and they must begin the work immediately, and gentlemen know as well as I do that the Senate will take up and consider this measure with due haste.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the request of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, for the time being, until we can find out just what this program is to be, I will object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BELL, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for 10 days, on account of important business.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, during the recent primary campaign in the first district of Wisconsin my opponent and his managers circulated a pamphlet or circular, containing charges relating to my votes since this country entered the war, which compel me, in justice to myself, to arise to a question of personal privilege.

I first invite attention to the fact that in a speech here I said:

> If war does come we will all be united in support of the Government. I shall do all that I can to help achieve a victory for our country.

Referring to that pledge of mine this pamphlet proceeds as follows:

> It is of interest at this time to note how well Mr. COOPER has fulfilled his pledge to "do all that I can to help achieve a victory for my country."
>
> It is a remarkable fact that, although the United States has been at war and is now infected with spies, propagandists, and criminal agents of destruction, Mr. COOPER repeatedly voted against measures to curb their activities and prevent their interference with the effective prosecution of the war.
>
> THE ESPIONAGE BILL.
> On May 4, 1917, Mr. COOPER voted for a motion to strike out the section in the espionage bill (H. R. 291) giving the President power, during any national emergency resulting from war, to prevent the publication of any information relating to the national defense which in his judgment might be useful to the enemy (p. 1857, CONG. RECORD).
> On the same day he voted against an amendment to the espionage bill giving the President power to forbid and punish for the publication of information about national defense that may be of aid to the enemy (p. 1860, CONG. RECORD).
>
> On the same day he voted against the espionage bill, as amended, which conferred powers on the Secretary of the Treasury to regulate the movements of vessels in the territorial waters of the United States; if necessary, to take possession of the vessel and remove persons not specially authorized by him to stay on board. It made it unlawful for any person to cause or permit the vessel to be used as a place of resort for persons conspiring against the United States. It provided for both fines and imprisonment for persons who attempt to endanger the safety of vessels, cargo, or passengers within the jurisdiction of the United States. It provided penalties of fine and imprisonment for persons who attempt to destroy by fire or explosives articles intended for exportation. It provided for regulations for the enforcement of neutrality when the United States is a neutral Nation. It gave the President the right to declare an embargo on provisions. It declared unmailable every publication of every kind containing any matter advocating or urging treason, insurrection, or forcible resistance to the laws of the United States (p. 1882, CONG. RECORD).
> On May 31 Mr. COOPER voted to recommit the espionage act, which was passed on May 4, to the conference committee with instructions to strike out the section providing for censorship of American newspapers during the war (pp. 3343–3344, CONG. RECORD).

Mr. Speaker, I have read sufficient to show that this pamphlet charges me with having violated that pledge by voting—"repeatedly" voting—in the interest of German spies.

It will be seen that the general charge is that I voted to protect German spies and propagandists infesting this country, and that this general charge is followed by a list of my votes in detail to prove that the general charge is true.

A few days ago I received a letter from one of the most prominent men in my district, one who has held positions of honor, a man of most exemplary character, in which he says:

I regret very much the outcome of the primary in your case. I believe it is a matter of large public concern that such political methods as were used in this district were allowed to succeed. There will be a lasting rebuke for such un-American, unprincipled political methods. We had great odds to overcome. A large amount of money was poured into this county. Each voter was solicited, and letters of influential citizens vouching for your disloyalty were circulated. * * *

* * * * * * *

We were handicapped in not being able to get more in this county to take hold of the campaign. They were frightened off by the disloyalty accusations and falsehoods.

It is not necessary for me to disclaim having a monopoly of the office of Representative in Congress from the splendid first district of Wisconsin. I have often publicly said that any voter in the district has, of course, an absolute right to aspire to the position. Nor have I ever objected to honest criticism of my acts as a public man. And here there comes to mind a saying of a great man, which years ago I memorized and never have forgotten. In speaking of one who enters upon a political career he said:

"Whoever enters upon such a career must be prepared to be often misunderstood and still more often misrepresented. He is sure to arouse enmities—and those not alone from opponents—and he will from time to time have to face unpopularity if he obeys his conscience."

I am not troubled by the ordinary fault-finding of political enemies. I have often profited by criticism. I welcome it when it is candid and fair. It is human to err, and I am quite human.

I know, too, that in this great world crisis, all matters of a merely personal nature seem very trivial. And it is therefore with unfeigned reluctance, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, that I ask you to listen to me at an hour like this when your thoughts, your hopes, your prayers are all across the sea with the boys carrying the flag which has never known and shall never know defeat. [Applause.] But this that I bring before you now is not criticism. This charges me with the crime of disloyalty, a charge which, if it could be established as true while I am living, would bring ruin upon me, and when I have passed away would forever blacken my memory. I do not ask sympathy. I shall make no apology. I shall offer no excuses. I shall make only a plain statement of the facts, for on such an issue nothing counts excepting only accuracy of information and truthfulness of statement.

The United States entered the war in April, 1917. April, May, June, July, September, and October came and went and we adjourned. During all those months Congress passed, and the President signed, bill after bill to carry on the war, and I voted for all of them, as every Member of the House knows. But this deceptive pamphlet went to people not familiar with the facts, and poisoned the minds of many honest voters. Honest people could not believe that men seeking to win a political office would descend to such methods and attempt to ruin a man by fastening upon him the charge of disloyalty through such deliberate misrepresentation of his record. So they believed it. I had man after man say to me, "Mr. COOPER, we were opposed to war; did not want to go into the war. You remember our legislature petitioned you to vote against it. You promised us in the campaign of 1916 to vote against it. But what hurt us was that you kept voting against bills to carry on the war after we had entered it—at least, we supposed so after reading that circular." Then I showed them the RECORD, and they were astonished. I have letters in my possession from men who had read that circular and attended the meeting which selected my opponent, expressing regret that they had not sooner made an investigation and learned the facts, acknowledging that they had been deceived, and promising, at the last moment, to do what they could for me at the primary; but this was too late.

Let us now return to October, 1917, six months after we entered the war. October came and we adjourned.

I could not go home then, for I had just been appointed a member of the committee to go to East St. Louis to investigate and report upon the riots in that city. A word about that appointment. I came into the Chamber just as the Clerk read my name, and turning to the gentleman from Iowa, Judge TOWNER, I said, "Judge, what is that?" He replied, "You are appointed on the committee to investigate the riots in East St. Louis." The Speaker will remember that when he left the chair, I went to the corridor, met him, and said, "I do not want to serve on that committee; its task will be disagreeable; and as I have not been able to be home with my constituents for some time, I would like to be relieved." The answer of the Speaker was, "Many Members have asked to be appointed on that committee, but I made my own selections, and it is not a pleasant task"—I am going to repeat exactly what he said, because I want the House to know the facts—"It is not a pleasant task, and it will not be one for any of you; but I think I have selected men who will get the facts and will tell the facts after they get them, and I insist that you go," and I went. Of course, I could not go home.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the gentleman details that conversation precisely as it happened. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am greatly pleased to have the Speaker corroborate my assertion. I have not exchanged a syllable with him upon this subject, nor had he the slightest intimation that I was to rise to a question of personal privilege; nor have I said a word to him about our conversation which I have just detailed.

We voted and voted on war measures through the spring and summer of 1917. You, all of you, know how I voted.

After the adjournment in October I went with the committee to East St. Louis. When our work ended I went home, arriving there on the 20th of November. I had only 10 days at home, and then was obliged to come here to attend the regular December session. December 4th came. As the House will remember, a great crowd was about the Capitol; its corridors were thronged; this Chamber was crowded; the Senate was here, and the Vice President beside the Speaker; foreign diplomats were in their gallery or on the floor; in the executive gallery were the ladies of the White House. The honorable Speaker appointed five or six Members of the House to go with five or six Members of the Senate, appointed by the Vice President, as will be remembered, to escort the President to this floor.

The Speaker knowing my votes on war measures and every Member on the floor knowing my votes on war measures and the President knowing my votes on war measures, and he knows them all, I was appointed one of that committee to escort him before that great assemblage.

I voted during another month on war measures, and on January 8, 1918, again there came a great throng around the Capitol, again the corridors and galleries were crowded, diplomats and members of the Supreme Court in the Chamber, the Members of the Senate here, the Vice President beside the Speaker. The Speaker appointed Members of the House and the Vice President appointed Members of the Senate, seven from each body, among these being the same gentleman from Wisconsin, to escort our great President onto this floor to deliver a war message. I mention this now because the facts as to my votes and these proceedings are all set forth in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and raise a very strong presumption that I would not have been appointed to escort in the President to deliver a war message if I had been voting to protect spies. The fact is, as all the House knows, that I voted for every war measure which Woodrow Wilson signed as President of the United States to prosecute the war, and the men who drew up that pamphlet and the men who circulated it knew that I had so voted.

"LOYALTY."

Seeking an answer to the question, "What is loyalty?" the National League for National Unity took a referendum of the 500 signers of its appeal to voters. As a result it gave out the following as the "practically unanimous" view of those men and women who represent the various elements of our national life—labor, agriculture, manufacturing, commerce, finance, the church, the bar, and so forth:

That candidate, in or out of office, or that citizen can be regarded as loyal who since the declaration of war has by work or act unreservedly supported and will support the Government in the vigorous prosecution of the war to a complete and decisive victory and who has not attempted to destroy allied unity and effort by attacks upon nations fighting with us against a common enemy.

THE PAMPHLET—CIRCULAR.

The pamphlet is cunningly drawn. I want you to understand this masterpiece of mendacity. Voters told me that they read the general accusation in the pamphlet, and then read the pretended record of votes as being specifications to prove the truth of the general statement that I had voted to protect spies and propagandists. The language in substance is—

It is of interest to see now he has kept his promise. It is interesting to know that Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin voted to protect the spies and propagandists.

Next after that statement the pamphlet pretends to cite my votes so that an honest reader would think that the citation of votes proved the general statement that I had broken my pledge by voting to protect enemy spies.

ESPIONAGE BILL.

Let us now examine the first specification:

On May 4, 1917, Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin voted to strike out the section in the espionage bill giving the President power during any national emergency resulting from war to prevent the publication of any information relating to the national defense, which, in his judgment, might be useful to the enemy.

The espionage bill contained 33 and a fraction pages and related to 10 important and very different subjects, included in 10 separate chapters. It provided punishment for many different offenses. I was in favor of all of the bill excepting only one provision. So was a large majority of the House, as was shown by the final vote. What, then, does this particular reference to my vote mean? What did I vote for? I voted for the motion of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] to strike out the proposition to gag the newspapers of the country. That is all—a proposition to gag the press. The gentleman from Pennsylvania spoke and voted for war, but he was opposed to the press gag. Thomas Jefferson said that as between a country with no government but with a free press and another country with a government but without a free press he would choose the country with no government but with a free press.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman if this infamous work was the product of men in his own district or some league outside?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will refer later to that. Mr. Justice Cooley said that unless we retain intact and sacred the provision of the Constitution which guarantees a free press to the people, this Republic can not endure. What was the vote on that motion, and who voted? The vote was 221 ayes to strike out, and only 167 noes. I voted with the large majority of the House, but the deceptive pamphlet makes no mention of that fact. Who voted as I did? Judge CLASSON, of my own State, who has no opposition for renomination. Who else? Mr. DOREMUS, now a Member from Michigan, and then chairman of the Democratic national congressional committee; Mr. ELLSWORTH, renominated without opposition; Mr. ESCH, renominated without opposition; Mr. FERRIS, now chairman of the Democratic congressional committee; Mr. FESS, now chairman of the Republican congressional committee. Who else? I can not take time to tell them all. Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan; and the gentleman from California, the great champion of war measures, Mr. KAHN. Who else? LAGUARDIA, the brilliant young Italian who, as we read, has been making speeches in Rome and Florence [applause], and between speeches mounting his aeroplane to go over and bomb the Austrians. Who else? The distinguished gentleman from Ohio, Mr. LONGWORTH; the gentleman from Kentucky, a close friend of the President, Mr. SHERLEY, chairman of the great Committee on Appropriations; and the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. WALSH. I think that I will say that again—the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. WALSH. [Laughter and applause.] I recall a scene just at the end of that vote when I heard a voice up in the Chair say, "Mr. Clerk, call my name." The Clerk called "Mr. Speaker." [Applause.] And the answer was, "Aye." Here it is. Here is the Speaker's vote with that of the "disloyal" gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]. But the voters who read the pamphlet knew nothing about all this. It carefully concealed the truth from them.

What is the next charge? That provision to gag the press being stricken out, a gentleman [Mr. GARD] offered an amendment, another press gag, to which the pamphlet refers in the second specification. I voted "no"; but it was adopted by 191 to 185, a majority of only 6. Now, who voted as I did against inserting this so-called Gard amendment? Well, the RECORD shows that among them were Mr. ANDERSON, of Minnesota, renominated; Mr. CHANDLER of New York, renominated; Mr. CLASSON; Mr. DOWELL, renominated; Mr. ELLSWORTH, renominated; Mr. ESCH, of my State, renominated without opposition; Mr. FERRIS, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Committee; Mr. KAHN, the great champion of all war measures; LAGUARDIA, now in khaki uniform doing his duty at the front; Mr. LENROOT, who when he was a candidate last spring for the Senatorship, the peddlers of this pamphlet escorted to platforms and introduced as 100 per cent loyal. Who else? Mr. MANN, floor leader; Mr. MADDEN, MCKINLEY, TILSON, TEMPLETON, TINKHAM, the first American in civil life who fired a cannon at the enemy. [Applause.] VAN DYKE, nominated by an overwhelming majority a few days ago and recently elected to be the head, or very near to the head, of the Spanish War Veterans of the Republic, and many more; in all, 185 as earnest patriots as have ever been here, Republicans and Democrats. The pamphlet, however, makes no mention of all this, but again purposely conceals important facts.

The pamphlet next charges that I voted against the espionage bill as amended. I did, and so did more than a hundred other Members, Republicans and Democrats, but that was on the first passage of the bill and not on its final passage as the authors of the pamphlet well knew. I voted against it on its first passage because it then contained a provision to gag the newspapers of the country. I thought then, and I think now, that the people of the United States have a right, for example, to know whether $640,000,000 of money appropriated from their pockets by our votes and the votes of the Senate to build aeroplanes was honestly and efficiently expended or whether it was not so expended.

It does not make our people any the less patriotic to have them know the facts. The people of the United States are determined to win this war, and they will see that it is won; and knowledge of the facts makes them all the more determined not only to win the war, but all the more determined also to send to the penitentiary men, if there be such, who rob the United States Treasury. [Applause.] But on May 4, the first time the bill came up for passage, it passed the House and went to the Senate. This was not a "final" passage. Every Member of the House knew that we would have another opportunity to vote on the bill when it came back from the Senate. The Senate made many changes in the bill and then returned it to the House. Then five Members of the House and five Senators were appointed a conference committee to adjust the differences between the Senate and the House. This committee took several days to consider the bill, agreed upon changes, and reported them to the House. As to what then occurred the pamphlet says:

On May 31 Mr. COOPER voted to recommit the espionage act, which was passed on May 4, to the conference committee with instructions to strike out the section providing for censorship of American newspapers during the war. (Pp. 3343, 3344, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

Note that word "act." The dishonest authors of this pamphlet knew the difference between an act and a bill. An act is a bill after a bill has passed both House and Senate, been signed by the President, and become a law. An act is a law. And yet they speak of the "act" which was "passed on May 4," in order to convey the impression that I was trying to help repeal the law itself.

I talked with many men who did not know that the bill went from the House to the Senate, but who thought that I had voted against the bill on its final passage. But it did go to the Senate and was materially amended, as everyone on this floor knows. Very many voters do not understand how laws are made here. They do not know that a bill which includes many new and most important subjects, which contains 32 and more pages, and which goes from this House to the Senate, is certain to be materially changed in the Senate and come back here and go to conference.

I did vote to recommit it; that is, to send it back to the conference. I did vote for this motion of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] to recommit it with instructions to strike out the press gag. And who else voted then to strike out the press gag? Well, there were some very distinguished gentlemen who thought as I did on the subject at that time, among them Mr. CLASSON, Mr. ESCH, both of my State, Mr. GARD, of Ohio, the very gentleman who offered the Gard amendment, against which 185 of us had voted, voted this time just as I did, to strike out his own amendment as it came from the conference. He made a speech, saying, among other things, that he could not support the amendment in the form in which it was then presented. And he voted as I did—here is his name—to strike it out. Who else? Mr. GREEN of Iowa, Mr. GREENE of Vermont, Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan, Mr. HAWLEY, Mr. HERSEY, Mr. HICKS, Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota, now baring his breast "over there" to help save the men who wrote that pamphlet. [Applause.] LAGUARDIA—was he loyal or disloyal? Mr. LENROOT, 100 per cent loyal by the certificate of these very men who defame me. And there was STEENERSON, TOWNER, VAN DYKE; in all, 184; and a nay vote of only 144. In other words, I voted with the majority of the House to recommit the bill, with instructions to report it back without the press gag. In due time it was reported without the gag and promptly passed the House. I voted for it. This was its "final" passage in the House. It also passed the Senate and went to the President. He signed it, and it became a law exactly as I voted for it. It remained a law in this form until May of this year, when it was amended. I voted for the law which amended it. But this dishonest pamphlet deliberately misrepresents the facts in order to injure me. The whole reference in it to the espionage bill is, in effect, a mere cunning, malicious lie.

The pamphlet tells only half or quarter truths about the espionage bill. You remember the story of the man who while reading a book exclaimed, "The Bible says there is no God!" The listener asked, "What's that?" The man repeated, "The Bible says there is no God." Then the listener said, "Let me take that," and taking it he read, "The fool in his heart hath said 'there is no God.'" [Laughter.] It is easy to tell a falsehood by telling only half a truth. Witnesses in court take an oath to tell the "whole truth." The oath required of witnesses is, "You do solemnly swear that the evidence you shall give in the cause now here pending, wherein John Smith is plaintiff, and John Brown is defendant, shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God." Unless the words "the whole truth" were there courts would reek with perjury. But this pamphlet tells half truths about my votes on war measures in order to convict me of disloyalty.

INJURY TO WAR MATERIALS, ETC., CONSPIRACY.

This pamphlet continues:

On March 6, 1918, Mr. COOPER voted against an amendment to the bill to prevent injury to war materials, which would include in the penalties of the bill those who conspire to prevent the erection or production of war premises, war materials, or war utilities.

I ask gentlemen to give the most careful attention to the artful methods which my opponent and his managers used to mislead voters. It may be of use to you this year in your campaigns. Now, what are the facts touching this charge? A bill was introduced in the House to punish whoever should wreck factories making war materials or in any way injure war materials or maliciously prevent their production. The bill came from the office of the Attorney General. We had nearly finished considering it, I remember well, when a Member of the House arose and offered the amendment which, as this pamphlet says, I voted against. It proposed to punish whoever should "conspire" to do anything which would stop the production of such materials, and so forth.

The bill itself did not contain that language. Every Member of the House, including myself, was in favor of the bill as it was presented. There would, I think, have been no vote against it. However, when this amendment containing the word "conspire" was offered, I listened. I listened, because sometimes, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, as you well know, the word "conspire" may be a dangerous word in a statute. If you leave it all to a judge upon the bench to determine whether certain acts constitute a "conspiracy," very much depends upon the temperament of the judge. Usually judges are fair-minded and humane; but this is not always true. One judge may say that certain conduct constituted a conspiracy which another would hold was not at all a conspiracy within the fair construction of the law.

And, therefore, when that amendment was presented, I listened. Why? Because only a few months before I had come from East St. Louis, where I had heard men testify that they worked in a factory at grinding cotton seed in an atmosphere thick with dust, the first shift from 6 o'clock in the morning until 6 o'clock at night, and the second shift from 6 o'clock at night until 6 o'clock in the morning, 12 hours every day, without either holidays or Sundays. It was not union labor at all. It was unorganized labor. And when they complained they were told to get out.

Witnesses stated that from 8,000 to 10,000—and it was not contradicted—negroes were brought up from the South to take the places of workers who did not like that sort of treatment, and that poor white men were brought for the same purpose from Chicago and other cities, men who, in order to keep body and soul together, would go to work anywhere. And, therefore, when a Member presented this amendment to punish people who should stop work or "conspire" to do anything which might stop the production of war material, I listened carefully. I wanted to know just the meaning of that word "conspire." I recall well when another Member arose and said:

You are going to hold—

I read from the RECORD—

You are going to hold over the head of men and women engaged in production—that is, on private contracts for the Government of the United States—the threat of punishment by penal statute, providing they get together for the purpose of improving their condition.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. NOLAN. Oh, yes. It is a conspiracy if they get together for the purpose of improving their conditions—

And so forth.

I listened, having in mind the fate of those people in East St. Louis, and I voted against that amendment. But it was adopted and went into the bill.

Then what happened? This pamphlet stops right there and leaves me voting as if I were opposed to punishing anarchists and bomb throwers or malicious conspirators who should get together and agree to injure plants making war materials. Thus again this pamphlet tells only a half truth, although its authors had the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in their hands when they wrote the pamphlet and knew that the RECORD contained all of the truth. Do not forget that. Do not forget that these men had the truth, the whole truth, before them when they wrote these falsehoods about me. And yet the pamphlet wholly fails to tell what next took place. The RECORD shows that a gentleman from New York immediately offered another amendment, construing the one just adopted and providing that nothing in the bill should be so construed as to make it unlawful for employees to agree together to stop work for the honest purpose of bettering their conditions of employment, and so forth. That was the substance of it. In other words, that the law should be so construed as not to punish people like those in East St. Louis, who, being shamefully abused, might say among themselves, a dozen, or 15, or 20, or more, "We can not endure this treatment. These men are making money. They can and ought to give us better conditions to work in."

I did not want that to be treated as a conspiracy. And yet should they stop work it would stop production. I voted for that amendment construing the first one because it would, if adopted, leave the law still to punish the bad man, the anarchist, and all wicked conspirators, but not to punish innocent working men or women who, because of the infamously awful conditions under which they were compelled to work, should stop for a time, and thereby briefly prevent the manufacture of some war material. I voted for that second amendment, and 271 other Members of the House voted for it; but the Member who had offered the first amendment voted against the second. The vote was 272 for and only 38 against it, and I voted with the majority.

And yet that circular leaves all this out and makes me in favor of men who conspire to bomb plants and kill our friends and neighbors—honest working men and women—doing what they can to help save the country.

And remember that that circular was drawn up by men who had before them the RECORD of March 6, 1918, showing, on page 3126, that I voted for the amended bill on its final passage. But the pamphlet makes no reference to this fact, so important if they wished to do me justice. The bill came up for final passage on the next morning. I read from the RECORD of that day:

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays. There were some of us who voted against the Cannon amendment who wish now to vote for the bill.

And I voted for it, as the RECORD shows. But all this is omitted from the pamphlet. Three hundred and twenty-one—all who were here—voted for the bill.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, politics in the United States of America ought to be one of the noblest of professions. If good men do not enter it, bad men will. Somebody must. Politics in its highest sense is the science of Government. It is that part of ethics which has to do with the happiness and the safety and the prosperity of the people. But politics like this circular is a thing of degradation and infamy. [Applause.]

MILITARY SERVICE.

Another charge in the circular is:

On April 12, 1910, Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin voted against an amendment to Senate joint resolution 123 (liability to military service of certain registered persons), which provided that quotas for the different States and Territories and for the District of Columbia should be determined in proportion to the total number of persons registered and liable for military service therein, including resident aliens who have waived all claims for exemption. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 5438.)

That vote was not in 1910.

Now, gentlemen, on April 12, 1918, I did vote against the amendment which they cite, 243 Members of the House, an overwhelming majority, voted against it and only 118 voted for it. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Apr. 12, 1918, p. 5058.) And the men who drew that charge against me had that RECORD in their hands, and by it they are convicted of deliberate, malignant, suppression of the truth. Here is what a very large majority of the House voted against:

Quotas for the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, or subdivisions thereof, called under the provisions of the act of Congress approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," shall hereafter be determined in proportion to the total number of persons registered and liable for military service therein, including resident aliens who have waived all claims for exemption.

I voted "no," as did 242 others. I can stop to read the names of only a few. CLASSON and ANDERSON, ANTHONY, ASHBROOK, BARKLEY, POWERS, BROWNE, of my State, who, I rejoice to say, has been renominated; CRAGO, DALLINGER, DENISON, DEMPSEY, DOREMUS, FERRIS, GARD, GARRETT of Tennessee, a distinguished Democrat and an efficient Member of this House [applause]; GLASS, the gentleman who is entitled in large measure to the credit of putting through the great Federal reserve act [applause]; HULL of Tennessee, a recognized expert on income taxation; and that great champion of war measures, KAHN, of California [applause]; KNUTSON, renominated by several thousand; LANGLEY, LENROOT, SHERLEY, RAINEY, TINKHAM, Dr. TEMPLE, of Pennsylvania, one of the most accomplished gentlemen and devoted patriots that has ever graced the House of Representatives [applause]; STEENERSON, TIMBERLAKE, TREADWAY, WASON, and other very deserving gentlemen whom I have not time to mention. The vote was 243 against the amendment, and I was one of that majority. I think I ought also to mention that the "white list" of the National Security League includes the name of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. ROGERS, and that on this amendment he voted just as I did, yet he is 100 per cent loyal. [Laughter.]

The pamphlet again tells only a half truth, for what was voted on was only half of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin be permitted to conclude his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin be permitted to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am very much obliged to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and to the House for its courtesy.

You know, but, of course, people in the country generally do not know that when an amendment capable of being divided is submitted to the House any gentleman can ask that it be voted on section by section, part by part. This amendment was so divided and so voted on, the first part being rejected, as I have just reminded you.

Then came up the second part of the amendment, but this circular makes no mention of it at all. Here is the second part. I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 5059:

> And credit shall be given on its quota to every State, Territory, District, or subdivision thereof for the number of men who have entered the military service of the United States from any State, Territory, District, or subdivision thereof since May 1, 1917, including members of the National Guard who were in the Federal service on that date.

Simply proposing to credit your district, my district, or any subdivision of any State, with those who had volunteered or were in the National Guard on that date. The President was informed of that proposition and had written a letter indorsing it. The amendment passed the House by a vote of 292 in favor to only 65 against. I voted with the majority, but the pamphlet makes no mention of that. Then the bill went to the Senate where it was changed by striking out the provision I just mentioned and returned to the House. Then the President wrote another letter saying that upon reconsideration he felt that it would be best under all the circumstances to accept the amendment sent over by the Senate, that good argument could be made upon either side; but that, all in all, he thought it would be better to accept it. Thereupon we did accept it, and I voted for the bill. But this pamphlet omits all mention of that.

Mr. FREAR. Will my colleague yield at this point?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. In the Wisconsin statute there is a provision that anyone issuing a circular must affix his name to it. Whose name appears at the head of that circular?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is signed by the Randall campaign committee. I believe Armstrong was its chairman at that time; yes; the name of William H. Armstrong appears on the pamphlet as that of the chairman.

Mr. FREAR. I will say that nearly every member of the Wisconsin delegation had similar circulars put out against them, that were equally lying and dishonest in character.

SHIP-PURCHASE BILL.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Here follows the next specification in this attempt to prove the general charge of disloyalty:

> It is also an interesting fact in connection with Mr. COOPER'S war record that on February 15, 1915, he voted against the ship-purchase bill. This bill provided for a shipping commission with power to purchase ships and operate them for the Government. Had this bill been passed at this time the Nation would have had a much larger merchant marine at the beginning of the war and would not now be so greatly distressed for means to transport troops, munitions, and supplies overseas. It would also have saved the American people many millions of dollars. (P. 4394, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

As I read that, how many of you gentlemen noticed that date, the year? This reminds me of an incident which shows how little attention readers usually pay to dates. A man met me on Monument Square, in my city, and, after shaking hands, said, "Hal, how did it happen that after we got into this war you voted against the ship-purchase bill? That vote hurt me." "Well," I said, "I should think it would hurt you to be so careless about dates which seriously affect the reputation of a man you have long called your friend. Have you been reading that circular?" He said, "Yes." Then I asked, "When was that bill voted on?" and he replied, "Some time after we entered the war, was it not?" He then took the circular from his pocket and read aloud, "February 15, 1915." I remarked that that was two years and two months before we entered the war. He raised his hand above his head, and said, "Well I'll be ——." I shall not repeat verbatim what he said, for I see by your smiles you already know that he used a large D.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to call attention of the House and the country to the similarity of the charges that were made against my colleague and against myself, and against my colleague from the fourth district [Mr. CARY]. In the list of these charges against me and my colleague I find listed the very same charge, "Voted, February 16, 1915, against ship-purchase bill (p. 4394); bill was passed." Not only is that true in this particular, but it is true as to many of the other charges that the gentleman has referred to, showing a deliberate purpose on the part of some to misrepresent the position of men in Congress who were performing their full duty. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I thank the gentleman.

When that friend of mine expressed his disgust at having been so deceived through his own carelessness I said to him, "Why, the man who wrote that list of votes knew that you would be very careless about dates, that you would read the general charge, and then, noticing that the first date or two was after we entered the war, you would pay no further attention to the dates." He at once replied, "That is exactly what happened in my case; it misled me entirely." It misled thousands.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. This is a fair and candid question: Does the gentleman believe that the Security League put these distortions out against him?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In the absence of definite information as to that league being connected with this circular, I do not wish now to make an accusation.

Mr. FOCHT. I asked the question for the reason that the rest of the Members of the House seem convinced that the gentleman has made a splendid case and clearly demonstrated that his record has been flagrantly misrepresented, and in the presence of the fact that the Security League has sent out questionnaires to Members of Congress wanting to know how they stood, how they stand now, and how they are going to stand for the rest of their lives, I believe it timely and just to know whether this league, as has been implied, is putting out these infamous character-assassin circulars against Members of Congress.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. I want to say that in my own case a two-column article in a newspaper headed by the National Security League came out with practically the same charges filed against me.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. As I have said, that ship-purchase bill came up here two years before we entered the war. It was not a war measure. We were then at peace, a neutral. My vote on it was not a vote on a war measure.

It was a bill to authorize the President to take a great many millions of dollars out of the Treasury of the United States to buy merchant ships. It was said that the only ships the President could buy would be those owned by the shipping trust, or the ships belonging to Germany and other countries, and which were interned in the harbors of New York, Baltimore, and other cities. The shipping trust could have held up the Government for their own prices, and the interned ships would have cost us a great sum of money.

The bill proposed that the United States, long before we entered the war, while we were neutral, should take two or three hundred millions of dollars from the Treasury and hand it over to Germany for ships which she could not use. To give Germany two or three hundred millions in gold would have been to put into her hands a very powerful weapon, and Members thoroughly acquainted with international law declared that England, Italy, France, Russia, and Japan would say that for us, a neutral nation, to do such a thing as that would be an unfriendly, an unneutral act; that we ought not to do it, and virtually every Republican and also many Democrats voted against the bill, the Democratic list including the very distinguished and highly successful Democratic leader, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. [Applause.] And the bill was defeated by 215 to 115. And yet this dishonest circular failed entirely to mention the fact that I voted with the majority. It suppressed the truth and purposely left voters to infer that I was opposed to anything that would help to carry on the war.

The circular says that had that bill passed it would have saved the Government many millions of money, and yet after we entered the war we promptly seized all these interned ships and got them without paying a penny. [Applause.]

Some of these ships are the largest, finest in the world. We have been carrying over our boys in those ships. We are going to keep using them to carry the boys in khaki across the sea until we have such forces "over there" as will win a peace that shall forever end the power of autocracy in the world. [Applause.]

FORTIFICATION BILL.

February 26, 1915, Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin did not vote on the motion to recommit the fortification bill with instructions that the committee report an appropriation of a million dollars for the purchase and manufacture of seacoast cannon instead of $200,000. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 6941.)

Why, that was February, 1915, two years before we entered the war. And yet they cite it to prove that I did not vote for measures to carry on the war.

Reader after reader who had not noticed that date said, when I called it to his attention, "Why, I thought that, of course, it was since we entered the war." Now, Mr. Speaker, too many people are mere headline readers. Too many people forget that, when they have in their charge the reputation of a fellow man, they should exercise the utmost care in weighing the evidence offered in a political campaign to convict him of an infamous crime. But they passed it off like that. Being honest themselves, they did not appreciate how they were being deceived.

What are the facts about this? Two years and two months before the war I did not vote on that bill. Why does the pamphlet mention that fact? Only to convey the impression that I was absent from the House a good deal; remiss in my duty. And yet a gentleman whose duty it is here to look up the records and keep track of them has written me a letter in which he certifies that before the House recessed last July there had been in this Congress 298 roll calls and that I had answered on 285. This, he wrote, was, in his opinion, the best record for attendance, or, if not the best, he was sure that no other Member had a better one. Many of the roll calls to which I did not respond were not when votes were taken, but simply when some one had raised a point of no quorum.

The men responsible for this pamphlet knew why I did not vote on that motion. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which they had in their hands when they drew that deceptive, malignant charge against me, disclosed to them the fact that I was paired that day with Mr. Brown, of West Virginia, then upon a sick bed in this city, a bed from which he never rose save as his spirit took its flight to the blessed realm where the soul wears its mantle of glory. If I were dying, unable to come upon this floor to represent my constituency, the pair clerk of the Republicans would go to the Democrats and say, "Mr. COOPER can never come here again, and we want some man to pair on these votes;" and any Democrat would consent to pair. But, having that RECORD in their hands, these men deliberately suppressed the fact that I was paired with Mr. Brown, and suppressed it in order to help them in their effort to convict me of an infamous crime. I pity the man who, in order to secure office, tempted by so trivial a thing as that, would attempt forever to ruin another's reputation.

For another specification the circular says that I voted for the McLemore resolution on "May 7, 1916." It should be March 7, 1916. Recently, in Wisconsin, I had men say to me, "How did you come to vote for the McLemore resolution after we entered this war?" The average reader of this circular, paying no attention to dates, taking for granted that this general charge includes the various specifications, would not know that that resolution came up here on March 7, 1916, more than a year—13 months—before we entered the war. Many prominent Members, Democrats and Republicans, including LENROOT, "100 per cent loyal"—145 in all—voted for it. The whole campaign of 1916 was fought out after the vote on that resolution, and I was elected by a plurality of 12,000. Not a word was said about that resolution during that campaign in my district. And yet this summer, more than two years afterwards, it was dragged out to do service in this conspiracy of defamation.

EMBARGO.

Another charge is one sent broadcast also by the National Security League, that I offered an amendment here to prohibit to American ships their legal right to carry arms or ammunition in their cargoes.

I never advocated an embargo, and the man who drew that circular knew it, and the man who wrote that article for the Security League knew it. What are the facts? We had presented in the House after the war began in 1914 a number of resolutions to prohibit the sending of anything, and especially arms and ammunition, from this country to the belligerents. I said repeatedly that we could not do that. When the colonies in South America a hundred years ago were struggling to free themselves from Spanish medieval tyranny they bought their ammunition here and in France and in other neutral countries. When Cuba, in 1898, struck for liberty, she came here to buy her arms and ammunition. Poor countries have not facilities for making those things, and they can not hope to win their freedom except by going to other countries having factories which make arms and ammunition.

No such resolution was ever reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The facts about my motion or amendment are being persistently misrepresented. Members of the House should know that this year powerful interests are at work determined to defeat, wherever they can defeat, men whom they know from actual experience they can never hope to own. [Applause.] You may profit from my experience. I want you to know the facts on this question of embargo and my attitude toward it. When the armed neutrality bill came up here I made a motion to recommit with instructions. Many of you voted for the proposition which I introduced. From the very beginning of that war I insisted that private contractors, private individuals, and corporations in this country had a right to make ammunition or anything they wished and to send it across the water at their own risk and sell it to the belligerents. But that was not the question involved in the armed neutrality bill. Here is what I said, and I now read from the RECORD report of my speech of the 1st of March, 1917:

The issue must be kept clearly in mind. The people have been misled. This is not a question of what private individuals or corporations in dealing with belligerents may do. It is a question of what under the Constitution a President can make the Government itself do. We all, of course, admit that private individuals or corporations may without violating either international law or any law of the United States sell and deliver arms and ammunition to a country at war or to any of its citizens. But it is a far different thing which this bill proposes. For it would authorize the President to make the Government itself a party to the traffic in arms and ammunition with belligerents, although when a Government becomes a party to such traffic it thereby commits a deliberate act of war. The bill is an attempt, in effect, to yield to the President a part of the constitutional power of Congress to declare war. There would be the gravest danger in giving any President more power to bring on war than already is lodged in his office. Already he has the power in his discretion to sever diplomatic relations with any country—an act often only the short prelude to war. And if in addition to this he is to have, or as he insists already has, the further constitutional power to make the Government itself help to carry arms and ammunition to a belligerent, then, of course, at any time the whole question of whether this Republic shall enter into a war raging in Europe, or Asia, in this hemisphere, or on the other side of the world, is left to one man.

That clearly states my position. This country was then still at peace, a neutral nation. We who voted for the motion were in favor at that time of having the President arm and convoy merchant ships carrying food and clothing and other noncontraband, but we were opposed to authorizing the President to arm and convoy ships loaded with arms and ammunition consigned to a belligerent, because for the President to do that while this Nation was at peace would be for him to put the Government itself into the traffic in arms and ammunition with belligerents; in other words, to commit an act of war while the Nation was at peace.

That came to a vote. Who voted in favor of my motion? One hundred and twenty-five Members, Democrats and Republicans. Here are the names of some of the gentlemen: Mr. ESCH, renominated; Mr. FULLER, renominated; Mr. GOOD, renominated; Mr. HAWLEY, renominated; Mr. HULL of Iowa, renominated; Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, renominated; Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota, now in France; Mr. JOHNSON of Washington, renominated; Mr. KENT, whom the President has since given a position of honor on the Tariff Board, where he is in frequent consultation with the President; Mr. LENROOT, 100 per cent loyal; Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania, renominated; Mr. QUIN, renominated; Mr. RAKER, renominated; Mr. RAMSEYER, renominated; Mr. RAYBURN, Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, Mr. TIMBERLAKE, Mr. TOWNER, Mr. VAN DYKE, Mr. WEBB, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, the law committee, all renominated.

One Democratic Member who voted with me on that occasion, who had voted for the war and for all measures to carry it on, as loyal a man as there is on the floor, came to me in the lobby and said, "COOPER, your statement upon that proposition is absolutely unanswerable, and under my oath I could not do otherwise than vote with you."

I was right then and I do not apologize for it now. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, it is not my loyalty that troubles these men—not my loyalty at all. They merely use the word "loyalty" to conceal their real motives. This conspiracy originated with a man whom I did not recommend for a post-office appointment. I have learned—but I learned too late—that while the snow was still flying last spring conspirators went out secretly to voters, showed them this alleged record of my votes, and then said: "John," or whatever his name happened to be, "this is a serious thing. We hate to part company with COOPER, but he has been disloyal; he has not stood by the country since we entered the war. Do not say anything about this. By and by we may have a conference and have to nominate somebody." And, as I say, I have received letters from men expressing regret that they had permitted themselves to be deceived.

PROFITEERS.

It is not my loyalty that troubles these gentlemen, not at all. But all the malcontents, whatever their grievances, are shouting "loyalty" to conceal their real motives. Some of the conspirators know that a year ago, in a speech here, I said that the men who were making millions of dollars out of war contracts ought to pay larger taxes, that our Government should do as England had done and take 80 per cent of war profits. We are informed that during the three years next preceding the war one of these war profiteers made an average annual profit of three and a half million dollars, and that last year they made $87,500,000. It is not right while our boys at the front are fighting, dying to save the Republic that men should sit back here in safety and make yearly profits of $87,500,000. [Applause.] I voted to protect honest workmen and honest workwomen from abuse by private contractors. I am opposed, after hearing in East St. Louis the testimony of poor creatures working 12 hours a day in the dust, without holidays or Sundays; I am opposed, and so long as I am honored with a seat on the floor shall always be opposed to establishing in the land of Lincoln a system of industrial slavery. [Applause.] They said that after all the outrages on Belgium and Serbia, after all the other outrages in Europe, I voted against war. True, I did; but it is also true that after Belgium and after Serbia and after all the other outrages in Europe the President kept us out of war and was reelected in 1916 because, after all of those outrages, he kept us out of war. The present very distinguished Democratic floor leader [Mr. KITCHIN] made a powerful speech against war and voted against it. Shortly before the July recess I said to him: "Have you opposition for renomination, Mr. KITCHIN?"

He said, "No; and it is a remarkable fact, COOPER, that for the first time since the Civil War, more than 50 years ago, the Republicans in my district have not nominated anybody. I have all of them, Republicans and Democrats." [Applause.] "Well," I said, "they have honored a splendid man, but are you not doing pretty well for a disloyal man?" [Laughter.] Putting his hand on my shoulder, he said, "COOPER, are they calling you disloyal?" "Yes," I replied. "Why," said he, "you voted just as I did." I said, "I know that." "Well," he inquired, "how do they get that way up there?" [Laughter.]

There were others who voted as we did and are now condemned by the Security League. JOHNSON of South Dakota, young, handsome, in his early thirties, voted against war and then bade good-bye to us and to his charming wife and lovely little children, donned the khaki and is now in France at the front helping to save the Republic and to protect the members of the Security League. Is he loyal? Who else? One who in 1861 put on the old Union blue, was in 43 battles, five times promoted for conspicuous gallantry in battle, came out of that war wearing the stripes of a general, every step of his promotion won by bravery in the face of death, Gen. ISAAC SHERWOOD. [Applause.] Is Gen. SHERWOOD disloyal? He risked his life on many a blood-soaked field to help save the Nation and save it for the men who are defaming him. But for ISAAC SHERWOOD and his heroic comrades, living and dead, there would to-day be no Republic of the United States of America for those men to live in.

I need not cite to you the joint resolution of my State legislature, nor the countless petitions and resolutions, the flood of letters from fathers and mothers and wives, my own repeated promises in the then recent campaign of 1916. All this is past and gone. But the circular denounces me because it declares I must have known what it says "all the world knew that Russia was a hollow shell." But the world did not know that "Russia was a hollow shell." This House did not. We knew nothing of the kind. You know now that Russia was a shell, but you did not know it then. And this can easily be proven.

You recall that after we entered the war the President appointed a commission to visit Russia and report upon conditions there. At the head of the commission the President put Hon. Elihu Root, of New York. The commission went to Russia, stayed there several weeks, investigated thoroughly, and came back. On August 5, 1917, immediately after the commission returned, the New York Times contained a report of an interview with Mr. Root, its eminent chairman, on what he saw in Russia. Here is an excerpt from that interview—four months after we entered the war. Mr. Root said:

> I can not refrain from saying that we bring back from Russia the greatest sympathy and the greatest admiration for that young democracy. We bring back an abiding faith that this great free, self-governing, democratic government shall be maintained intact. We bring back the kindliest feeling and the greatest respect for the Russians, for their high degree of self-control and their ability for concerted action.

On August 9, 1917, the New York Times reported an interview with Maj. Stanley Washburne, who was very familiar with conditions in Russia and had been with the Root Commission. Maj. Washburne said:

> People in this country say Russia is through, that her troops are retreating, and that she can not be counted upon to do her bit. I deny such a statement most emphatically.

Of course I do not cite these statements of Chairman Root and Maj. Washburne to justify my vote. Not at all. But only to show how willing the authors of this circular were to ignore and misstate the facts in order to do me an injustice.

But now, knowing the facts, we all rejoice that our country entered the war. We know now, after the breaking to pieces of Russia, what our presence in the battle line means to the world.

I am an American. My ancestors on my father's side came to this country from England in 1647, and on my mother's side somewhat later from England and Ireland and the heathery hills of old Scotland. One of my ancestors was with Arnold in the awful winter of the siege of Quebec and died from cold and exposure and was buried beneath the snows of Canada. The blood in my veins is the blood of an American revolutionist who died for our liberties. [Applause.]

I know what my country means to struggling humanity. I know, as every man knows who has read history, that the destruction of this Republic, even its defeat by an autocracy, would set back the cause of civil liberty, the cause of government by consent of the governed, the cause of government of the people, by the people, for the people, for a thousand years.

This I have known since when a boy my father taught me a great truth from the first inaugural of George Washington:

> The preservation of the sacred fire of liberty, the destiny of the republican form of government, may justly be said to be deeply, perhaps finally, staked upon the result of the experiment committed to the hands of the American people.

When I repeated this to him my father bade me never to forget it, and I never have. It is inconceivable that a man of my lineage, my antecedents, my training, would ever be guilty of a thought disloyal to the Republic of the United States of America. [Applause.]

But the authors of this circular knew that in these times of great excitement it is often, too often, only necessary to point the accusing finger at a man or a woman and thousands are willing, without waiting for evidence, to say, "Guilty, guilty."

This war must go, will go, to a victory, a triumphant victory, that shall forever end war on this earth. Nothing else ought to be, nothing else shall be. My votes have been steadily cast for that. And now, as we look across the sea and hear the roar of the big guns and see the flashes light up the sky, our thoughts, our prayers are all with the boys battling—dying—for liberty. The death lists tell us that heroes from Wisconsin are there. And as I look and see the long line go gleaming on into the red-blazing whirlwind with Wisconsin at the front, there springs unbidden from my lips—

"Here's to the Blue of the wind-swept North
As they meet on the fields of France,
May the spirit of Grant be with them all
As the sons of the North advance.

Here's to the Gray of the sun-kissed South,
As they meet on the fields of France,
May the spirit of Lee be with them all
As the sons of the South advance.

And here's to the Blue and the Gray as one,
As they meet on the fields of France;
May the spirit of God be with them all
As the sons of the flag advance."

[Prolonged applause.]

ADDRESS OF HON. ALBERT JOHNSON.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], under the special order of the House, is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I ask to have read at the Clerk's desk the following extract from War Department orders.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read, without objection.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SPECIAL ORDERS, No. 205. WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, August 31, 1918.

Paragraph 41. The appointment of Hon. ALBERT JOHNSON as captain, Chemical Warfare Service, United States Army for the present emergency, with rank from August 31, 1918, is announced. He will proceed 10 days after date to Camp A. A. Humphreys, Va., and report in person to the commanding officer for duty as student in the engineer officers' training camp.

[Applause.]

By order of the Secretary of War:

PEYTON C. MARCH, General, Chief of Staff.

Official:
P. C. HARRIS, Acting The Adjutant General.

Modification of orders:
September 11, 1918: Capt. ALBERT JOHNSON is authorized to accept September 20 and then comply with original orders.

P. C. HARRIS, Acting The Adjutant General.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I desire to thank the Members of the House and the leaders on both sides for giving me 15 minutes this day, interrupting as I do the preparation and closing vote in connection with the great revenue bill.

Mr. Speaker, the most impressive moment in my life was when, almost six years ago, I stood before the Speaker, and, as a Member of the House of Representatives, took an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and to defend this Nation against all enemies, foreign and domestic. That oath is always in the heart of every true citizen of our Republic. [Applause.] But the expression of it verbally at the moment of coming into the high honor and privilege of a seat in the House of Representatives can never be forgotten.

The most solemn moment in my life was when my vote was cast for a declaration of war against the German Government. I had long been ready for that vote. The great State of Washington had, months before, by resolution of its legislature, pledged the wealth, the men, and the resources of that State in case of war. [Applause.] In my campaign in 1916 for election to the Sixty-fifth Congress I told my constituents that war was inevitable. I asked them not to return me to Congress if they expected a vote from me that would not sustain the United States in the full maintenance at all times of its dignity and its rights. I was sent to this Congress with a majority of nearly 18,000 votes. I have been renominated by my party as a candidate for election to the Sixty-sixth Congress, and in addition to the support of the Republican Party I am pleased to say that many of the most prominent Democratic leaders in the congressional district which I have the honor to represent have voluntarily published statements to the effect that they will support me on election day.

The great State of Washington was in the forefront in the patriotic declaration of its legislature in January, 1917. It is in the forefront now. It leads in shipbuilding. It leads in production of spruce for airplanes. It is near the top in wheat growing and in all other lines of activity on account of the war.

And I would like in that connection, my friends, to say that Seattle, the neighbor of Tacoma, needing housing facilities badly, for the city has grown to be a city of nearly 400,000 people, has not waited for the Government to build the houses. The business men of Seattle have subscribed $10,000,000, and there will be ready by Christmas time in that city for the workingmen new houses which, if placed together one next to the other, without allowing for alleys or streets or parking space, enough to reach 28 miles. [Applause.] And Tacoma, Aberdeen, Hoquiam, and Spokane are not behind. Our State is not asking the Federal Government to do everything. We will do what we can out there. [Applause.]

That State's draft regulations have been taken as models for other States. Washington men have filled all quotas [applause] and have volunteered in numbers far above the average. Further, the State of Washington has within its borders on the outskirts of the city of Tacoma and under the shade of the majestic mountain of that name Camp Lewis, a beautiful, healthful, inspiring cantonment. Soldiers train there for war at the Nation's beauty spot, in the Nation's playground; and the site for that cantonment, 80,000 acres, was given to the Government by the people of Tacoma and Pierce County at a cost to them of $2,000,000. [Applause.]

My colleagues, I believe that the people of the State of Washington fully realized the meaning of the President when he said, "Politics is adjourned." They understood that during the war all patriotic political parties must write their platforms with one plank paramount, and that plank, "Win the war." When the war is won platform making will be resumed, and the principal planks will deal with methods of raising revenue to pay the war debt. I believe that an important plank in the Republican Party platform will declare against the various "isms" which have come forward now either under war necessity or under skillful fostering of promoters and propagandists. A gentleman high in public office—in fact, the assistant to a Cabinet Secretary—speaking recently in the Pacific Northwest, said:

Let it soak into your minds that internationalism is the idea that America now stands for.

I can not agree with him. Americanism is what America stands for. [Applause.] He said further:

It may be that before this thing is ended nationalism against internationalism will be the biggest issue—

And so forth.

If that be true, I can predict the attitude of the Republican Party. We want no Bolshevism and do not propose to reach it by any steps toward "internationalism," which has been the cry of the red-flaggers, the anarchists, and the firebrands for years. At last we are stamping out the revolutionary I. W. W. I am thankful that, many years ago, I was in at the beginning of the exposure of that treasonable organization, and that I have had some part in the preparation of laws that are breaking it up.

We will be watchful now when we see mice of a gentler breed gnawing at the very foundations of our Republic. When we were at peace most of us paid little heed. But they shall not nibble and gnaw while we are at war. [Applause.] They might as well find it out now as later. Let us be careful when we send out mediators and conciliators from Washington, the seat of the Government, that we do not send out biased and prejudiced agitators. Leaders of political parties with treasonable platforms can not keep out of jail now, and the victorious returning soldiers will take care of the situation a little later by methods provided under the laws of this free Government. Returning soldiers will realize as never before that our Government "of the people, by the people, for the people," along the lines laid down in the Constitution by the fathers, has never been improved upon by any Government in any part of the world, Utopians and internationalists to the contrary notwithstanding. [Applause.]

And now, my dear friends, comes another great and proud moment in my life. To-morrow I shall take the oath of allegiance as an officer in the Army of the United States as a captain in the Chemical Warfare Service. This is the gas and flame service of our Army, made necessary by the violation on the part of our enemy of the conventions of warfare. While behind the lines in France and Belgium last winter and in the hospitals of England I saw the fearful results of the use of deadly poisonous gas and burning flame. I recoiled with horror. My blood boiled. Every fighting instinct was aroused. In the war speeches I have made this past year here, there, and everywhere I have never failed to describe in detail these attacks with gas and the aeroplane raids upon defenseless women and children in cities beyond the war zone. I have spoken of the fortitude and grandeur of the British people in their desire not to retaliate in kind. But now the time has come when the United States and the noble nations with which we are allied must use all of the force at our command. Therefore since I had long ago determined to see service in the Army I am glad I have been placed in the chemical service. [Applause.] I go to take my place as one of our millions of fighting men, as one unit in this mighty Nation's man power.

I have not tendered to the governor of Washington my resignation for the remaining few months of this Congress. Concerning that step I shall be guided by the wishes of the constituents of the third congressional district of Washington. Should I not resign the distinguished Senators and all of my colleagues from the State of Washington have assured me that they will attend to my legislative work. I have arranged a pair with a Democratic Member from the State of Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], who is entering the Army, which pair will stand if an extra session is called. [Applause.]

My colleagues, I can not go away from the House, even temporarily, without expressing my sincere appreciation of the good feeling with which you have accepted my efforts here. I have not knowingly hurt by word or action any Member. I admire the Speaker [applause], not only for his fairness—especially to the new Members—but for his determination that Congress, as Congress, shall not be unnecessarily and untruthfully belittled or lampooned. [Applause.] Every man here knows that the problems of this Congress and of the last Congress were difficult in the extreme. Platforms of no party pointed the way. The public some day will realize the work of the Sixty-fifth Congress, just as we Members personally know what it has been. No words can be found by one Member with which to thank the other Members for their work almost day and night in many of the important committees which have produced the legislation necessary to the conduct of the war and to the directing of the patriotic efforts of all the citizens of the Nation toward unity of purpose. E pluribus unum is our national motto now as never before, my friends. [Applause.]

I believe, with the Speaker, that the House of Representatives will in free vote act with dignity and for the best. There is wisdom in numbers after all.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, this very day a thrilling cry is beginning to ring throughout the length and breadth of the Nation—

WIN THE WAR NEXT YEAR!

Additional millions are being called to the colors. We have asked for great numbers between the ages of 18 and 45. They are responding as one man. Perhaps some stepped aside when we asked for the last Army from the men of 21 to 31. Some thought, perhaps, that an army of 1,500,000 could be easily raised without them. Not so to-day. The clamor is to get in—not to get out. The President has asked for the aid of the older men. My colleagues, I can not resist that call. Of the family to which I belong every male member fought for the United States in the War of the Revolution. And of that family every male member fought against the dissolution of the Union. My father was a law partner of William H. Herndon, who was Abraham Lincoln's law partner. I am 49 years of age. Nature endowed me with a strong physical frame. I knew that I could pass all medical tests. How could I resist making an application? [Applause.] I go now to see if I can qualify as a captain, and I hope to lead a company of fighting men in a form of warfare that the enemy by his practices has forced upon us. I think I can qualify. [Applause.]

Win the war next year! It can be done. The signs are propitious. Our soldiers in France have made an inspiring start. By the time we have our new legions equipped and trained and in line over there it will be January, 1919. Then the cry will be, "Win the war this year!"

My colleague, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS], just back from the battle fields, tells you in an inspiring oration that it can be done. Our gallant Gen. Pershing tells the people of the Nation that if we send the soldiers it can be done. The Nation believes it can be done, and all of our people will suffer great privation willingly, make great sacrifices gladly, and submit to any tax to make the supreme effort to win the war within 12 months from this hour.

Let no American cease to remember the part our allies—all of them, great and small—are playing; the suffering they have endured and are enduring. France mourns the loss of more than 2,000,000 soldiers dead and wounded. Italy's loss has been heavy. Great Britain lost its original army almost to a man, and is losing in dead and injured many thousands per month. British casualties in four years have been 2,500,000. The smaller nations—Serbia, Montenegro, and Roumania—have paid a terrible price. Russia lost in killed alone more than 2,000,000 men before she dropped out through revolution brought about by intrigue and bribery. All allied nations have bled before the brutal war lord of Berlin, who soon must pay. [Applause.]

To win in a year will require supreme effort on the part of every man, woman, and child. All must fight. Those in the ranks of the Army and on the ships of the Navy put on uniforms to distinguish them from the enemy. But every person is a fighter now. The widow whose mite buys a thrift stamp is a fighter. The man who tends a furnace or turns a railroad switch is a fighter. Nonessentials must go. Luxuries must go. Privations must be endured. What is self-denial now to the descendants of those who crossed the seas to settle the Colonies; who conquered the wildernesses of Kentucky, Missouri, Indiana, and Illinois; who homesteaded the prairie States and fought the Indians; who tunneled and mined the Rocky Mountains; who struggled for gold in California; who made the march to the trackless Northwest "where rolls the Oregon," and who endured the privations of the stampedes to Alaska? Or what are privations to those among us who themselves, or their ancestors, helpless, penniless, and without opportunity for education, fled from oppression to the beacon light of the Goddess of Liberty in America. [Applause.] Oh, citizens, that light shines now with a new brilliancy that reaches to the corners of the world, and it shall endure for all time. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I hope that when the Sixty-sixth Congress is called in regular session December 1, 1919—14 months from to-day—I shall appear, stand where I stood almost six years ago, and again take the oath of allegiance as a Member of Congress. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that your own brave son, Lieut. Col. Bennett Clark, will return [applause], and the proud people of your State of Missouri, in grateful remembrance of your distinguished services to the Nation, and in appreciation of his services, will send him, if he wishes to represent the Bowling Green district, whenever you conclude that long years as a faithful public servant entitle you to a rest, in the shades of evening, under your own vine and fig tree, near the banks of the Mississippi, in the State you love so well. [Applause.]

Returning with Bennett Clark will be all the boys whom the mothers of the Nation have given—all the boys who have not fallen for the flag and for the principles of liberty. And the quicker we, with our allies, can end the war, the greater the number of soldier boys who will return. Victorious they will return.

I fully believe, and I devoutly pray, that by that time the bells in every hamlet of this Nation will ring with victory. And then, Mr. Speaker, our actions will be guided by the words of the inspired Lincoln—

With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right—and guided by these words we will proceed to rebuild our Nation along lines of permanent peace; our allies will do the same; and all will combine to make secure and safe the various republics that will spring from the ashes of the monarchies of Austria, Germany, and unfortunate Russia. Complete victory; permanent peace! Then must follow an era of good will that shall run as long as history is written. [Applause.]

ARMS, AMMUNITION, AIRPLANES, AND GAS MASKS (H. DOC. NO. 1286).

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a House document a series of speeches containing information on the subject of arms, ammunition, airplanes, and gas masks, which I have brought before the House on a number of different occasions. I wish to bring together this material in the form of a public document, because I have a great many requests for the several speeches, especially from men in the camps and cantonments, where they are very much interested in the subject of ordnance, airplanes, and gas masks.

I have submitted the matter to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] and to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KIESS], of the Committee on Printing, and I have the approval of both.

Mr. FOSTER. Is this a compilation of the gentleman's speeches on this subject?

Mr. TILSON. It is. I desire to have the information and material that I have brought together published compactly as a House document.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to print as a House document the various pieces of information that he has collected on the subject of ordnance, gas masks, and so forth. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE REVENUE BILL.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the revenue bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the revenue bill. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12863, the revenue bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment pertaining to the oil and gas provisions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 16, line 1, after the word "wells" and the comma, insert the following: "timber, and other natural deposits," and a comma.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, the word "timber" does not come in in the proper place there. Timber is not a natural deposit. It ought to be "other natural deposits, and timber." The way it is stated there it looks as though timber was a natural deposit.

Mr. KITCHIN. I accept the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks leave to modify his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from North Carolina if there ought not to be the same amendment on page 38?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have an amendment to cover that.

Mr. FORDNEY. The same amendment there?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified committee amendment: Page 16, line 1, after the word "wells" and the comma insert the following: "other natural deposits, and timber," and a comma.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 38, line 25, after the word "wells" and the comma, insert the following: "other natural deposits, and timber," and a comma.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, there is another amendment that we were considering to add to this section, but we have decided that its proper place is on page 59, to section 320. This amendment will be offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITE]. I ask unanimous consent to return to section 320, on page 59, for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to return to the page indicated, for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Let the amendment be reported first, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. WHITE of Ohio. I offer the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITE of Ohio: Page 59, line 23, after the word "act" and before the period insert a comma and the following: "except that there shall be deducted [in lieu of the deduction provided in clause (a) of paragraph (9) of subdivision (a) of section 234] a reasonable allowance for depletion [including in the case of producers or prospectors a reasonable allowance for hazard not to exceed 10 per centum of the value in the ground of the oil withdrawn during the taxable year] such deduction to be made under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina to return to this section for the purpose of offering this amendment?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, as most of my colleagues, I think, realize, I am engaged in the production of crude oil and natural gas, although I have not taken much part in the production of the latter product in the debates of this House. [Laughter.]

The problem of arriving at a satisfactory solution of the amount due the oil producer to offset the exhaustion of his capital which is involved in the production and sale of oil from a given property has been one of the most difficult problems with which the committee has had to deal. The committee has been charged by the House with the very great responsibility of raising $8,000,000,000 through taxation, in order to successfully prosecute the war, and there is manifestly great danger in making an exception to any one industry, of inviting attempts on the part of the Members to ask for like exceptions for other kinds of business. The extra hazard involved in prospecting, or, as the oil men term it, "wildcatting," is the basis of the argument I used to the committee to accept this amendment, and is the justification I wish to advance to the membership of this House to secure their approval of the amendment.

In dealing with this question it should constantly be borne in mind that the industry is a "highly essential" business during the present war period. The present revenue law in its treatment of the subject provides, broadly speaking, that all income from the sale of oil and gas, after deducting the capital actually invested in the particular producing property, is profit. No account whatever is taken of the tremendous sums of money expended prior to the taxable year in fruitless endeavor to locate and produce oil, which, in a way, has been a process of elimination by which the present producing properties have been discovered.

The actual capital that goes into the drilling of a well is small compared to the results obtained, if perchance the well proves to be a good producer. It needs no argument to convince the most superficial mind that there is no relation between the hazard of the oil and gas business and that of any other nonmining industry. Popular opinion is that the oil and gas business is tremendously profitable, but popular opinion does not take into consideration the "dry holes," which far outnumber the productive wells. Again, popular opinion does not know that the average of all the producing wells in the United States is less than three barrels per day per well, nor does it know that the average production of all the wells in the country's richest producing oil field, namely, Oklahoma and Kansas, is less than eight barrels per day per well. Yet the fact remains that even individuals or corporations may come into possession of a tremendously profitable property with a comparatively small capital investment in that particular property, but, again, to arrive at this conclusion no account is taken of the losses sustained by the lucky individual prior to making this "strike," and under the existing laws the scriptural injunction, "For whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance; but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken even that which he hath," seems to have been taken literally and applied to the oil and gas producers. Popular opinion has so long associated the Standard Oil Co. with the oil industry that to a certain extent the profits of the industry seem to have been measured by the size and proportions of the oil company referred to. Very few people know that the Standard Oil Co. is only in a very limited degree a producer of oil.

At the end of the first 10 years of my business experience in trying the wildcat game, with all the ups and downs involved in it, I read the early history of the growth of the Standard Oil Co. with a keener appreciation of the financial foresight and business acumen of Mr. Rockefeller and his associates.

The first well to produce oil was drilled near Titusville, Pa., in 1859, and it took but few years for Mr. Rockefeller and Mr. Archibald and the men associated with them to realize that a more profitable part of the business lay in the transportation and refining of the product of the wells than in the highly hazardous business of searching or drilling for oil.

In other words, the Standard purchased the oil from the successful wildcatter and avoided the risk involved in prospecting, and how well they succeeded all the world knows.

By reason of the increased demand made by war conditions upon essential industries fuel demands have tremendously increased. The demand made upon oil as a fuel is such that there is now a shortage of 30,000,000 barrels over production and oil in storage is being exhausted at the rate of 70,000 barrels per day, as shown in August reports. One very important element in the increased demand made upon the oil industry is by the Government; that is, our fleet of destroyers, constantly increasing, requires a high-grade fuel oil, as do the ships of the Emergency Fleet Corporation. One has only to consider the size and number of ships proposed to be built by the Government to appreciate the enormously increased demands which this new shipping is making upon fuel. In addition to this our merchant fleet demands fuel oil in daily increased quantity, largely due to the great difficulty in obtaining "stokers" to fire the boilers with coal. In addition, it is of the highest importance that our fleet of destroyers, our emergency fleet, and general shipping should have as nearly as may be a smokeless fuel, and to the extent that fuel oil meets this requirement over coal the demands for it are increased. These demands are a recently added burden to the industry.

Can oil be obtained? Can the oil requirements of the country be met? These vital questions can be answered only by first propounding another question—that is, Can something be done to stop the stampede of the wildcatter? Can some consideration be shown him because of the tremendously increased cost of his hazard so that he may be induced to continue his search?

Can prospectors (wildcatters) be induced to go out in increasing numbers and discover oil fields at present unknown?

Who is this wildcatter and what does he do? He is a natural-born gambler. He is a man who could not be hired to own a bank, a farm, or a department store, with an assured income. He is the offspring of the "Forty-niners" who fought their way through the Indians to the California gold coast. He is a brother of the men who follow the call of the "red god." You will not find him where oil is being produced, for these acreages and leases cost money, but you will find him miles in "advance" of any production, gambling his little all to find oil where the "wiseacres" have said oil does not exist. You will find him enduring privation and hardship that one out of thousands may—and they do—find oil. This is the oil finder. It is of him the "operators" buy their fields, and on his work they buy surrounding territory. If it is learned that a man or small company is wildcatting, the operators immediately secure at little cost leases on surrounding territory. If the wildcatter makes a strike, the operators then put in money for development, but only then.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE of Ohio. I do not present this picture of the wildcatter to you as an appeal to your sympathy, but that you may better understand the practical problem presented to the committee, and my reason, as a member of the committee, for presenting the amendment now under consideration.

While I admit great personal interest in these men because of my close association with them in the oil business, as a legislator I am, and you as Members of Congress should be, intensely interested in not enacting any legislation that will discourage him or put a stop to his activity. The production of oil has been decided to be a highly essential industry toward the successful prosecution of the war. During the consideration in the committee of the revenue act of 1917 I stated that I feared the rates of taxation imposed on the oil industry would result in a falling off of the production of crude oil, and my prophecy has proven accurate, and in the face of the lessened activity of the wildcatter and the resulting decline in production, the committee has authorized me to offer this amendment. Under the provisions of this bill a corporation—and a large percentage of small corporations are in the business of prospecting for oil—will be required to pay in the form of taxation approximately 60 per cent of their income, if their operations prove successful, but of course will have no compensation for their losses resulting from dry holes, and these failures amount to a percentage of about 49 out of every 50 attempts to find oil.

I know the oil men are as patriotic and loyal to the country in this time of peril to human liberty and free institutions as the men in any other business, but they can not be criticized for discontinuing operations involved in the discovery of new fields if they find their companies are heading toward certain bankruptcy, except as to 1 company in 50.

My amendment provides that in the development work in producing oil the company making the return at the end of the taxable year may, for the purpose of figuring its tax returns under the excess-profit method or prewar method, deduct an allowance for depletion, in addition to the other provisions of the bill, in an amount not to exceed 10 per cent of the amount of the oil drawn during the taxable year.

May I at this point read a letter bearing on the amendment written by Mr. Requa, Federal Fuel Administrator?

UNITED STATES FUEL ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., September 19, 1918.

Hon. GEORGE WHITE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WHITE: My attention has been called to an effort to procure an amendment to the revenue bill (H. R. 12863) for an allowance based on the quantity of oil and gas withdrawn or produced during the taxable year, to provide for the replacement of such withdrawals or production. A depreciation or replenishment account of some such character is undoubtedly justified and sound practice. Unlike agriculture the miner is constantly exhausting his capital, and some recognition must be given to the necessity for setting aside a fund for replacement purposes.

I desire to say that I heartily approve such a provision and regard it as highly necessary.

Very truly, yours,
M. L. REQUA,
General Director Oil Division.

As Mr. Requa suggests, this 10 per cent is in the nature of a replenishment account to enable the producer to acquire a fund to warrant his taking the risk in wildcatting for new production. I am forced to frankly admit that the percentage is not in my judgment high enough, and may I further state that the oil business ought to be given an extra allowance of 20 per cent, and I hope another body will in its consideration of the bill increase the per cent recommended by the committee.

The acceptance of my amendment will at least put the House on record as recognizing that some special consideration in the way of taxation must be shown the producing business if we hope to maintain any adequate supply of new production. There is power under war conditions in Congress and in the hands of the President to take over a coal mine in case the company refuses to operate or the miners refuse to work, and the Government could undoubtedly produce the coal, but there is no power in either Congress or the President to force an individual or an oil company to wildcat for oil or gas. The Government could take over the oil business, but certainly, if they should attempt to do developing work, we would have to very materially increase the amount of liberty bond sales and the amount carried in this revenue bill. In other words, it is not a practical proposition to even consider.

There is still another phase of present oil production (not related to the wildcatter) which should receive most serious consideration at the hands of Congress. It is this: The needs of the Government and the industries in the service of the Government require and demand that the oil industry shall be stimulated to the very highest possible point of production, and superficially one would think that if the price of oil is high—and it is—oil production will take care of itself; that the natural self-interest of the producer will solve the problem. This conclusion would be correct were it not for the indisputable and undeniable fact that in the development of new fields it is not possible to pay to the Government the large percentage of earnings of the property and at the same time proceed with the normal development of the property. The oil field, once found, becomes purely a financial problem and for a long time requires not only that every dollar taken out in production be put back into the field, but that large sums of money in addition be raised to put into development. There is no reason why the oil producer should not pay the same percentage of his profits to the Government that other citizens do; and, as I know him, he has no desire to escape his equitable part of the burden. We would ridicule the individual who advised hitching a pair of ponies to a 10-ton truck that it was necessary to haul up a grade, but I am forced to express the fear that it will prove impossible for the oil producer to "make the grade" under existing and proposed revenue law unless our act is liberalized, and my amendment is at least a step in the right direction. It is a hard, cold, practical problem demanding reasonable solution. The Government requires large sums of money, and the people are patriotically responding to heavy taxation. The Government requires oil, but with the billions of money at its disposal the Government can not acquire one barrel of oil that does not exist. The Government's actual need—yes, its necessity—is for millions of barrels of oil that are not being produced, and the production, as I view the situation, of this oil is in the hands of Congress. I trust the House will accept my amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Ohio. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The amendment will not affect the income of the corporation taxes, but only the excess-profits tax.

Mr. WHITE of Ohio. That is true.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Chairman, I had not prepared to speak on this topic, but there are a few figures I want to submit to the House as a reason why I think this amendment ought to be adopted.

On the 1st of January, 1917, the total amount of oil above ground in the United States was about 165,000,000 barrels. During the year 1917 there were produced within the United States, in round numbers, 300,000,000 barrels of oil. During that same year 1917 there were consumed 335,000,000 barrels of the amount produced in the United States and of the stock on hand above ground at the beginning of that year. That means, therefore, that we consumed 35,000,000 barrels of oil during 1917 in excess of that which was produced within the United States during the year 1917. At that rate of production and of consumption, in five years' time we would totally consume every barrel of oil above ground as of January 1, 1917.

Although the country seems not in its daily life to realize it, we are approaching one of the supreme tragedies to civilization in the depreciation of the stocks of oil above ground and in the policy with respect to the consumption of oil and production of oil, which does not keep pace. In addition to what my friend from Ohio [Mr. WHITE] has said, here is something that I desire to call to the attention of the House: In our taxation policies, if we take a national bank for example, we are taxing only its net income. We are not at all taxing its capital or its surplus and undivided profits. Therefore, we are not injuring that national bank, except that we are denying the stockholder as liberal an annual or semiannual dividend as otherwise he would receive, because we are taking that in the form of taxation. The same is true with respect to our manufacturing establishments. The same is true with reference to our plantations and farms. The same is true, indeed, with reference to most of the great industries of the country, unless it be mines and mining of some sort. When you tax the net income from mines—in this instance from oil—you are taxing the very principal of the thing itself, for no human being can tell when a sulphur mine is completely exhausted, nor can anyone tell when an oil well is completely exhausted, except that on some date such oil well or sulphur mine ceases longer to produce. Oil is produced from sands from 1,000 to 4,000 feet below the surface of the earth. You can not get a well without running a risk of a loss of $10,000 to $25,000, and it is an experiment every time. You may go within 50 feet of where an oil well gushes, as in my home county in Texas, some five or more thousand barrels of oil a day, worth at present $1.80 a barrel, and spend $25,000 to put down a well, thinking to penetrate the same sands and to have the oil, through gas pressure, exude from your well, without getting any oil. You take the entire risk of the $25,000, and it is only by accident that you get oil—not always even in the case of a well in an established field, and very rarely in a field that is not established but which has the indications on the surface and which justifies you in drilling. After you do get the well you exhaust every day the capital, for there is no opportunity of getting any money from it except by exhaustion of the principal.

The effect of taxing that sort of an exhaustible supply, which has that sort of enormous risk involved, in the same way that you tax the net of a corpus that is not exhausted, is that no sensible, sane man will continue in the same zealous way to jeopardize his capital in the sinking of wells in "wildcat" or unproven fields, or even in fields that are proven, as a man would do in a business the capital of which is not exhausted.

It will be a tragedy to civilization if oil plays out. This city of Washington and the whole country would be in darkness. The wheels of commerce can not run, the mighty ships of the ocean can not plow the sea. It would mean the breakdown of civilization as completely as if the Prussians were to put their cruel heels upon the neck of civilization, because this modern civilization of ours is largely predicated upon oil.

Mr. Chairman, as the production of oil, and perhaps of other minerals with which I am not as familiar as I happen to be with oil, because the two largest oil fields in the United States are within my home county of Harris, in the State of Texas, is necessary to the existence of our civilization, I trust that gentlemen will take heed to what I am saying, for I speak from what I have observed and I am trying in a plain and practical way to communicate it to you. I say that men are ceasing to jeopardize the enormous sums of money which even one well entails and will continue to do so if they are to be taxed upon the oil that comes out, practically all the profit, and have nothing allowed for depreciation. This amendment tendered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITE] in substance provides that an allowance of 10 per cent for taxation shall be allowed for depreciation. It certainly is a sane thing to do. The only thing about it which is not right is that a larger sum than 10 per cent for depreciation ought to be allowed, because 10 per cent implies exhaustion of the well in 10 years, whereas, undoubtedly, wells are exhausted sooner. In our oil fields where the gas pushes out the oil in what are called "gushers," failure of flow occurs in periods of from 6 to 12 months at most, and usually 60 to 90 days. In a pumping well there are rarely realized over 250 to 300 barrels per day, and that kind of well does not justify going down the great depth of three or four thousand feet.

If the necessary amount of oil for the purposes of war and industry and all the purposes of our modern civilization are to be supplied, then those whose ingenuity, risk, and industry are necessary to that result should and must be placed on equal terms with other legitimate and necessary industry and not penalized into bankruptcy.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, little need be added to what has been said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITE] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] upon this subject. I realize the difficulty that the Committee on Ways and Means has encountered in undertaking to get the amount of money out of the oil industry that it should pay at this time into the Treasury without doing injustice to some who are engaged in that industry. It is a very difficult question that they have had to deal with. I know that from conferences that I have had with members of the committee and also with experts in the Treasury Department. I am hoping that before this bill is finally completed some way will be discovered to impose a suitable tax upon the oil industry without doing injustice to anyone in the business and that at the same time will stimulate a production of oil—a thing that is most essential at this time. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio is well enough, so far as it goes, but it does not relieve the wildcatter, as he is known in the oil business, from the heavy burdens laid upon him by the present law—this proposed law. The men who spend their time and money and all of the money they can borrow in finding an oil field must, as soon as they discover oil, find a purchaser—not by the barrel—for the oil that they produce, because they are not content nor able to engage in that kind of oil business. They are wildcatters, discoverers of new fields, and are as essential to the oil business as the refineries and must be encouraged, in order that production of oil may be stimulated.

It was the wildcatter who discovered the great oil fields, the Cushing field, the Midcontinent field, the great oil fields of Texas, Kansas, Oklahoma, and Wyoming; those fields have been discovered by men who have taken a gambler's chance. They borrow money. As soon as they discover oil they must sell their lease, their oil in bulk, and pay their debts. If they sell, 80 per cent of the purchase price must go into the Treasury under this amendment, less 10 per cent, with a tax of 12 per cent on the remaining part of the sale price. This does not stimulate the production of oil. The production of oil is now far below the daily necessities of the country, and we are drawing upon our reserves to the amount of about 70,000 barrels per day, while the production is at the same time decreasing. Three years ago the Cushing field was producing at its height 350,000 barrels a day. Today it is producing 55,000. The great Kansas oil fields two years ago, a year ago, produced large quantities of oil. That production is falling off rapidly. There is nothing now to stimulate the pioneer or discoverer in the oil business to go out and discover new fields, and they are not being discovered, but our consumption of oil is increasing daily, and the necessities of the country for the use of oil are increasing. Something must be done that is not accomplished by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio or by any other legislation that is now proposed.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I do.

Mr. CHANDLER of Oklahoma. I wish to call attention to the fact that 90 per cent of all oil produced is produced from wells less than four years of age; that is, from new wells.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is especially true of the Midcontinent field.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I have three minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I plead for the brave, the courageous men who I know are engaged in the expensive and uncertain business of discovering new oil fields. Some of them have succeeded, many of them have failed. I know a few who have made fortunes. I know many who have lost every cent they have put in the business. The fortunate ones spend what they get for the sale of a lease with a newly "brought in" oil on it in developing other fields or drilling other oil wells. They are that kind of men. They are not asking anything of Congress that is unreasonable; they want no favors. They simply want to be able to continue in their business. As it is now they are required to pay practically all they get as a result of their discovery, perhaps the only strike they have made, when they have to pay 80 per cent of the sale price of their lease into the Treasury of the United States. So they are not engaging in the business. They can not sell their leases, their discoveries, to oil companies that are able to develop and produce the oil.

There is another matter I want to mention in this connection. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] is interested in sulphur; I am interested for my constituents in lead and zinc, and I believe that following the word "oil" the word "mineral" should occur in this amendment. If that is not done here it will have to be done elsewhere. I know the difficulty of offering such an amendment on the floor without consulting with the committee on a great bill that is made up as this has been with a view of having it harmonize with the whole; therefore I hesitate even to suggest that the word "mineral" follow the word "oil" in the connection I have indicated. But the men who produce lead and zinc are in much the same condition as the man who produces oil. When they sell their oil and mine products they sell their principal, as was well stated by the gentleman from Texas, and the oil wells and the mines rarely run longer than four years on a paying basis. Then not only the profit but the principal from the discovery, whatever it has been, is completely exhausted.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the rather modest amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio. The only possible objection there can be to the amendment is that the relief it grants, while helpful as far as it goes, is in a very great number of cases inadequate. There are very few people, I think, who have not to do in a practical way with mining and oil production who understand the hazardous nature of those industries. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] in his statement a moment ago very clearly indicated the very great difference in the effect of the high tax rates carried by this bill on an ordinary going commercial or banking business and as applied to a mining enterprise. You may take 80 per cent of a man's income from his ordinary business and still leave him with his business intact, going, prosperous, and certain for the future; but whenever you tax the income of an oil producer, of a mineral producer, you are taxing, as the gentleman from Texas stated, his capital, because his profit, be it large or small, to a certain extent reduces invested capital. The difficulty to-day with the oil business in the country so far as new production is concerned is that the patriotic citizen, anxious to meet his obligation as other citizens must meet them, is confronted with this difficult dilemma in the face of legislation taxing as heavily as this bill does. He must in the nature of things meet continuous losses. One well out of two or three or four or five may be a success, and the losses that occur at times are of a character and are so associated with the business activity of the individual or the corporation that it is difficult under the provisions of general legislation to afford the miner, the oil producer, the wildcatter, an offset or credit for his losses. On the other hand, he must pay and pay heavily and tremendously on his occasional successes. As a matter of fact, the tax is frequently levied on an apparent rather than a real profit. Based on all of the operations of the individual or the corporation, it may not represent a profit at all, but a gain which to a certain extent recoups for serious losses. This amendment will not completely meet the situation; it can not. A number of gentlemen have had in mind other amendments to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. But we have realized that the committee, having compromised its differences, having agreed in the main to stand by their completed work, we could not expect to have the committee accept, and we could not hope against the opposition of the committee to have any real important amendments adopted. I do not mean to say that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio is not important, because it is as far as it goes excellent and very important. Unfortunately it does not go far enough. It does not cover all the ground. I am in hopes that elsewhere, where the work of the committee as a whole can be scrutinized, that it may be possible to suggest some further amendments that will reach business involving great hazard. We can not afford to discourage mining. Surely we can not afford in these days to discourage oil production, one of the most important products for the carrying on of the war. The oil men do not desire any special relief or special privilege. They ask only that we so provide that the hazards of their enterprise may be taken into consideration and provision may be made whereby a tax that may be fair under any other conditions of business may not be unjust and confiscatory. Even under the present law, in which the levies are much lower than they are under this bill, I know of men who actually paid income tax upon thousands of dollars of apparent profit they never got, who were compelled to borrow money in order to secure funds with which to pay the taxes on apparent profits which actually did not exist.

They paid them cheerfully. And I want to say to the credit of those who have had the administration of the law, that they have been fair and reasonable and have gone as far as they could in affording relief of cases of this character. But there is need in this law for some legislation whereby enterprises of hazard and liable to sudden exhaustion and rapid depreciation can be provided for even more adequately than in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITE]. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. WHITE of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to correct a typographical error in the amendment. After the words "except that" insert "in the case of oil and gas wells."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], the chairman of the committee, if it would be out of harmony with the scope of the bill as it has been prepared to add "lead and zinc" following the word "oil"?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not believe that we ought to go further than that. We have taken care of those in the mineral deposits. That is satisfactory, I understand, to those——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I was fearful that was the position the committee would take and that was the reason I did not offer the suggestion. I think they are taken care of.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 128, line 22, just for a moment in order to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to return to page 128, line 22. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I can explain a little better than the amendment on its face will explain. This relates to the so-called "luxury" sections. There is one classification of "pure luxuries," by reason of the nature of the article, on which is imposed a flat tax of 10 per cent. There is a second classification on which a tax is imposed on the price paid above a certain price fixed in the bill.

Paragraph 15, page 128, includes tapestries and textiles for interior furnishings, and so forth, and on page 131, line 17, carpets and rugs are taxed. The committee, acting on what seemed to be correct information at the time, only made one classification of "rugs" and placed them under section 905. Some time later business facts which have come to some of us, and which we consider reliable, would suggest that rugs, both imported and American, made principally of wool, should be classed as luxuries per se and transferred to that flat 10 per cent provision on page 128, paragraph 15. That would leave the remainder of the rugs of various descriptions subject to the tax, on page 131, line 17, under the classification of "carpets and rugs," including those made of fiber. The amendment, therefore, is simply to amend page 128, line 22, by inserting "imported and American rugs made principally of wool."

The remainder of this subject matter would be left as on page 131, line 17.

I ask for a reading of the two amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 900, page 128, line 23, by inserting, after the word "buildings" and the comma, the words "and imported and American rugs made principally of wool" and a comma.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the second amendment, to carry out the purpose of that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 131, line 17, by inserting, after the word "fiber" and the comma, the words "except imported and American rugs made principally of wool" and a comma.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, of course that is not the part to which the gentleman got consent to return. Necessarily——

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I undertook to say that the only reference in the present bill to rugs is on page 131, lines 17 and 18. Under the further facts which have come to the attention of some of us from business concerns that seem entirely reliable, it was thought entirely just to make two classifications of rugs and put one under the 10 per cent luxury provision and leave the remainder of rugs in the bill as they are now.

Mr. WALSH. But I would like to ask the gentleman what is the necessity for this amendment on page 131?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The purpose of that is to insure the taxation of all rugs of fiber or any other character that do not come under the description contained in the amendment to paragraph 15, so as to insure the taxation of all rugs under one or the other classification.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman spoke to me about this amendment, and I thought there would be no harm in transferring carpets and rugs from the 20 per cent tax to the flat 10 per cent tax, but I did not understand that it was to be confined to rugs made of any one material. I understood it was to be rugs and carpets of any kind, made of any material.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. The information which a firm here in the city, and others, gave us—the firm of W. B. Moses & Son——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know the firm very well.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee (continuing). States that the classification which has just been inserted in paragraph 15 is one peculiar to itself; that is, the one that relates to rugs made principally of wool. They are the really valuable rugs. Now, we left rugs made of fiber or any other material, and less of a luxury, for taxation on their values in excess of $5 a square yard under section 905, page 131.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The point the gentleman makes, if I understand him now—and perhaps I did not understand him before—is that the higher-priced rugs will go in the flat 10 per cent class?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. They would go in the 10 per cent class, just as jewelry or any other luxury per se, by reason of the nature of the article.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But that differentiates the rug made of wool from other rugs and put rugs made of cotton, for instance, if there should be such rugs, into an entirely different class, although the price might be equal.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. My information is that these are the really valuable classes of rugs which would go into this new classification, and that all the others can properly fall where they were originally placed in the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I should say to the gentleman that I did not quite understand the proposition as he presented it a little while ago. I understood the transfer was to be as to all rugs and carpets. We may get into trouble if we attempt to deal with a variety of raw materials entering into the manufacture of rugs and carpets.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that it will be to the advantage of the cheaper rugs to be taxed as was originally proposed in the bill. It would only be fair to put the costly ones under the flat 10 per cent class clause, where jewelry and all other luxuries are placed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman's amendment provide that these rugs to be transferred from the 20 per cent to the 10 per cent class are to be rugs made exclusively of wool?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Made principally of wool. That is the designation we obtained from these business people. Of course we are acting only on their information, for the truth of which they vouch.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am inclined to think it was unfortunate to have the question raised as to the materials entering into the rugs. But, having made that point, I shall not object to the passage of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, by unanimous consent it was agreed that we would return to page 12, paragraph 8, for the purpose of considering an amendment which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] desires to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized, and offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GOOD: Page 12, line 14, after the word "forces." insert "or as income from any source."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, subdivision or paragraph (a) provides for an additional exemption to officers and enlisted men in the Army and Navy of the United States. That provision is short, and reads as follows: Providing for the exemption of—

(8) So much of the amount received by a person in the military or naval forces of the United States as salary or compensation in any form from the United States for services abroad or at sea in such forces as does not exceed $3,500.

As amended it would read: Providing for the exemption of—

(8) So much of the amount received by a person in the military or naval forces of the United States as salary or compensation in any form from the United States for services abroad or at sea in such forces, or as income from any source, as does not exceed $3,500.

The situation presented is this: A person in the Army, for example, who has been commissioned as a major, if he has been in the service long enough, receives a salary of $3,500 a year, and I assume that this exemption was placed at $3,500 in order to take care of all officers up to and including the rank of major.

Now, what is the situation if the bill is adopted as it was reported to the House? A man who is commissioned as a major, for example, in the United States Army receives as an exemption, in addition to his other exemption, $3,500. His brother, a private, who has made the same sacrifice in giving up his business, but who receives a salary of $360 a year, receives an exemption of only $360. The major in the Army, fighting for the democracy of the world, receives an exemption under this bill of $3,000 to $3,500 because he is a soldier, but the private, his own brother it may be, who is fighting under him, receives a soldier's exemption of only $360 a year. Let us keep in mind the fact that this provision is the exemption for the soldiers. It is the only provision in the bill giving the soldier an exemption because he is a soldier.

I say it is unfair, it is unjust, to write into a great bill like this an exemption giving to the major and all officers higher than a major an exemption of $3,500 a year, and then give the private, who makes the same financial sacrifice, an exemption of only $360 a year. Why this unjust discrimination?

In this connection it must be remembered that the law now provides that every officer and enlisted man engaged in the Army or Navy in overseas duty receives in addition to his regular pay 10 per cent of his salary. The major and officers with a rank higher than that of a major not only receive an exemption of $3,500 a year, but they receive on account of foreign service additional compensation equal to and greater than the total salary of the private.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. In a moment. Now, let us be fair to these men. Two millions of them will soon be on the other side, and they have given up their business and their occupation. They are not subjecting themselves only to the danger of warfare but they are allowing their business to suffer in order that we may win in this war. And we here, in making this law, should be mindful of them and give to those men, those privates who have a little income from some other source, the same exemption granted to an officer. Let us look after them while they can not look after themselves and give them the same exemption in dollars and cents that we give to any officer in the Army or Navy, I do not care what his rank may be.

Now, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McKENZIE. I simply wished to ask the gentleman from Iowa if the purpose and effect of the amendment is not to put the private soldier on exactly the same footing as the officer?

Mr. GOOD. Absolutely, so far as exemptions are concerned. And if there is anything wrong with that, as a matter of principle, if there is anything wrong in placing these 2,000,000 privates on the same basis, so far as exemption from income taxes is concerned, with the officers, then I would like to know what it is. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, more than any other member of the committee I am responsible for this provision in the bill. I thought it no more than just that we should exempt a man from taxes on the amount of his income from the Government when he is fighting for you and me across the sea or on the ocean. Some members of the committee did not agree with me, but this provision was finally agreed to. The question was brought up that if we exempt from taxes everybody in the Army or in the Navy it would exempt many rich men from taxes on income derived from their holdings of property in the United States. My purpose was to exempt the boy from the payment of taxes on the measly income he receives from Uncle Sam while fighting for you and me across the sea, and I know of no more just exemption from taxation; but to exempt the millionaire from taxes on income that he receives from other sources than from the Government as salary is something that I do not believe is just or equitable. No law can be written here or elsewhere that will operate equally and justly upon all the people coming under its provisions.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GOOD. By this language you do exempt every man who happens to be a millionaire and who is commissioned as a major from taxes on an income of $3,500.

Mr. FORDNEY. You exempt him from taxes upon his salary from the Government and nothing more, and he ought not to be exempt from anything more. The rich man who has several million dollars of property in this country is fighting alongside of your boy or my boy or the farmer's boy. Why exempt him from the payment of taxes on his income in this country? The poor boy has none. He has no income except what he gets from Uncle Sam. Why, then, favor the rich man's son more than you do the poor man's son. That is exactly what you do if you put your provision into this bill. I am not prejudiced against the rich man's son. He is fighting over there the same as the poor boy, and he is entitled to all the credit that a poor boy is entitled to. There is no discrimination here in this bill. But why exempt him from the payment of taxes on his income derived from property here at home, or his income other than that which he gets from the Government?

Mr. DEMPSEY. The provision which is offered would only exempt to the extent of $3,500, would it not?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; the limitation is $3,500.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The amendment would only exempt to that extent, would it not?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. It would not exempt beyond that?

Mr. FORDNEY. No.

Mr. DEMPSEY. It would not exempt the millionaire?

Mr. FORDNEY. It would exempt the millionaire from that much of his income received on property over here, and that is the thing I do not want to do.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Is it not true that an officer in the army can barely subsist on the salary that he gets anyhow?

Mr. FORDNEY. That is my information; yes.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. And that the private has about as much left at the end of the year as the officer has, has he not?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Is not the effect of the gentleman's amendment to give to a private in the Army who may have here a business bringing him in an income, say of $2,400 a year, an exemption from taxation upon that income over his $360 a year, so that the private will be exempted up to the same amount as the officer?

Mr. FORDNEY. Is the gentleman speaking of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, that is right; but my good friend, let me answer you, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] has well said, my information is that the officers as well as the privates have very little left from their salaries. I never was in the Army and do not know what the expenses of an officer are. I know the poor private who has a family at home, who is carrying $10,000 insurance, has to pay $6.50 or $7 a month for that, and he is called upon to contribute to his wife $15 of his $35 or $36 or whatever it may be, and that, together with the premium upon his insurance policy, leaves him only a few cents a day for the little things that he may get on the outside over there, and he has nothing left. But that is equally true of the officer. He is expected to spend more money than the private. He must spend more money. He does spend more money, and he has but little of his salary left.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman believe that an officer who gets a salary of $3,500 from the Government should be exempted from taxation, and that the private who has an income outside of his salary which, combined with his salary, would amount to $3,500 should only have an exemption on the $360?

Mr. FORDNEY. My good friend, let me say to you frankly that I proposed this provision in the law upon the ground that the soldier should be exempt, whether here or over there; but I modified my proposition later and permitted it to apply to those on the sea or over there, in order to get a majority of the committee with me——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I ask for one minute more.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. I want to ask the gentleman a question, and I ask that he may have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Michigan be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. It is true, is it not, that the private and the officer both already have an exemption of $1,000 or $2,000, depending upon whether they are married or not?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; certainly. Everybody coming under the provisions of this law has an exemption—if single, an exemption of $1,000 per year; and if married, an exemption of $2,000 per year. Now, I want to exempt him from the payment of taxes on all his income from the Government while he is in this war. I ask for nothing more, and I do not believe we ought to go further than that.

Mr. TREADWAY. Up to $3,500.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. REAVIS. The law as it stands now in this bill would exempt an officer from $3,500, as I understand it?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. If the income of a private, combined with what he gets from the Government as a soldier—that is, his wages as a soldier plus his private income—amounts to $3,500, the private will have to pay a tax on that?

Mr. FORDNEY. If his income is from property at home; yes.

Mr. REAVIS. From whatever source it may come, if that amounts to what the officer is exempted on, the private pays and the officer does not?

Mr. FORDNEY. The object of the provision of the law is to exempt him from the Government income and nothing else. If there is any other income coming to him than from the Government, I am not trying to exempt him from taxes thereon.

Mr. REAVIS. Whatever the object may be, the effect of the law as now written is that the private pays taxes on income from which the officer is exempt.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; if his income is under $3,500. Everybody is exempt, according to the provisions in the law, up to $3,500 a year income from the Government.

Mr. REAVIS. If the Good amendment is adopted a private will receive, no matter from what source, the same exemption as the officer.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; you exempt everybody up to $3,500, no matter where the income comes from.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I think the gentleman from Michigan is right. I do not know how it is in this war, but in the Civil War it was true. I served 9 months as a major, 9 months as a lieutenant colonel, 4 months as a private, and the balance of the 4 years as colonel, and at the end of the war all I had was $250.

Mr. FORDNEY. And what was the gentleman's pay or salary a year?

Mr. SHERWOOD. About the same as it is now, only a little less. When a private soldier had no money and wanted a furlough he usually borrowed the money from his captain or the colonel commanding the regiment. Just before the Battle of Franklin, fought on the 30th of November, 1864, I loaned an officer, Lieut. Leander Bennett, $100. He was shot dead in that battle. That was the end of my $100.

Mr. FORDNEY. As I understand, the gentleman came out of the war poor, although he received an officer's pay?

Mr. SHERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. And the gentleman came out with little or no money?

Mr. SHERWOOD. I had to start my career over again.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa possesses a great deal of merit from two standpoints, and I would like to say a word in reference to both of them. I have great deference for the views just presented by our good friend from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], and I am thankful that the committee saw fit to bring in this provision good as it is. But I beg permission to suggest that the basis of their calculation is artificial and a wrong one.

They say that the income derived from the Government shall be exempt. It does not matter to the soldier or the private or the officer from what source the income comes. The practical proposition to him and his family is how much does he receive from all sources? The problem for us should be, How much exemption shall we give these men while they are engaged in the service? The two points of view I have in mind are these: First, the private about whom much has been said and with all of which I most emphatically agree. The other point of view is in reference to the officers below the grade of major. I want you seriously to contemplate the situation that this bill leaves them in.

This makes an exemption in favor of the professional soldier. I have no objection to that, I am heartily in its support, but I do not believe in this period of war we should make an exemption in favor of the professional soldier which we are not willing to give the citizen soldier who comes at the call of his country. [Applause.] Very few citizen soldiers in this war can have that grand and glorious record that our good friend from Ohio, Gen. SHERWOOD, has. He entered the arena of the great conflict, like many of the citizens, as a private, and promotion was speedy, recognizing his merit. This war of all wars is a war of professional soldiers chief in command. The great body of the officers that come from the citizenship of the country will never get higher than the rank of captain, and mighty few of those will ever be advanced to the grade of major. The great bulk of them, 200,000 or more of them, will be second lieutenants, first lieutenants, and captains.

If you do not adopt the amendment as proposed you are putting an exemption in favor of the professional soldier and one that you are not giving to the citizen soldier. Their condition is the one that should appeal to us strongly. They are the ones that have left their private business—doctors, lawyers, dentists, business men throughout the land who have given up a profitable business to enter into the country's service. Very few of them but have left families, not exactly destitute, but who will feel the pinch as the months go by. Let us give them all these exemptions. Let us put them all on the same basis so that all men in the service of their country during this war shall all alike, private and lower grade officers and higher grade officers, know that they can have an income up to $3,500, if they can get it, that will be exempt from taxation, and I believe it will be for the well being of the country's service, not only now but in the future, if another crisis shall arise. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I shall not detain the committee but a minute or two. I wish to state how this exemption matter came about. I noticed that England and perhaps some other of the foreign countries that have been in the war from the beginning had adopted a tax-exemption policy as to soldiers and sailors, which the present provisions of the bill now contain. After seeing that, I made a motion on the subject and of like purport in the committee. I would not have referred to this except that the gentleman from Michigan has done so. That motion, after some discussion, remained in abeyance for a time, when the question was renewed in a little different form by a motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]. Thereupon the committee proceeded to dispose of the entire matter, with the result that the committee felt that the policy adopted by some of these other countries in the war, which, by the way, has not been questioned either by the soldiers, legislatures, or by the civilians at home, should be adopted.

The principal idea was that the soldiers abroad would find no time or opportunity to make returns of their income, and that in a large number of cases it would only relate to their salary. They have no time to sit down and make up returns in the midst of the fighting going on day and night.

The theory of this bill as to the income-tax features, as it is the theory of similar laws elsewhere, is that the profits derived from capital and business in this country should be uniformly subjected to the different taxes imposed upon it. The Government, however, with respect to the salaries and compensation it pays its soldiers and sailors while engaged in service abroad, by this provision in the bill places them upon an absolute equality, so far as exemptions of Government pay is concerned. If the committee desires to abandon that policy entirely and to take up a new theory of additional exemptions, which would also relate to all profits derived from capital in this country, that is quite a different and a very far-reaching proposition and one which I dare say few of the soldiers or sailors, if consulted, would insist upon, because they have not done so elsewhere. I feel that those who have substantial businesses here in charge of their agents, who would make income-tax returns, would expect them to do so and let the profits of their capital, continuing in operation as it does, be upon the same footing as other profits derived from business in this country. I repeat, the present provision, in view of the fact that the law already exempted those with smaller incomes who are serving in the Army and Navy, only undertook to relieve all soldiers, whether officers or privates or noncommissioned officers, from the trouble, from the almost impossibility, of complying with the law by abandoning their duties over there long enough to make income-tax returns with respect to the salaries or compensation received from the Government.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Is this intended to be an additional exemption to the $1,000 and the $2,000 provided in the previous paragraphs of the bill?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. So that if an officer is married he gets an exemption of $5,500, if he is getting a salary of $3,500?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes. I would say that the whole policy of this provision is based upon the question of whether the Government will relieve soldiers and sailors from making returns and paying taxes on compensation which they received from the Government as such soldiers and sailors.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for lines 11, 12, 13, and 14, page 12:

"That the amount received by a person in the military or naval forces of the United States as salary or compensation, of any form, from the United States for services abroad or at sea, shall be exempt, and that all private soldiers or sailors shall be exempted from the payment of an income tax."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have five minutes upon the main proposition, but if it is in order now to vote upon the substitute, very well, and I shall take my five minutes on the Good amendment after we take the vote on the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

The substitute was rejected.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to close debate upon the amendment and all amendments to this section in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I believe from the speeches made by gentlemen who favor the Good amendment that not one of the gentlemen nor any Member of the House understands exactly what the amendment is and what the provision in the bill is. The committee thought that only the men who braved the seas, who had left their homes, who had left this country and were fighting or working to win the war in Europe, should have an extra exemption over and above the regular exemption of one and two thousand dollars. The committee did not think, and I do not believe that the men in this House, or 5 per cent of the people in the United States, think that these officers who remain here, these officers we see parading down these streets every day here and elsewhere throughout the United States, remaining here at home in safety, while the boys at the front are facing the dangers, should have any exemption from taxation any more than the regulation exemption, because nine-tenths of these officers who remain here are getting more salary, making more money, than they ever did in their lives before.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will ask the gentleman not to interrupt me.

Mr. GOOD. But the gentleman is mistaken about my amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, I know the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. GOOD. My amendment does not affect a single man in this country.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am going to show the gentleman that it does. I said that he did not understand this amendment. Here is the gentleman's amendment, and anyone who reads it will know what it means. It is as if you would take out section 8 and substitute for it the following:

So much of the income of every person in the military and naval forces of the United States that does not exceed $3,500 shall be exempted in addition to their exemptions allowed by law.

[Cries of "Oh!"]

Mr. GOOD. Oh, no.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let us see how much the gentlemen who cry "Oh" and the gentleman from Iowa who says "No" know about this amendment. Let me read the bill and the gentleman's amendment, and there is not a man in this House, lawyer or not, who will not agree with me that this amendment does exactly what I say it does. This is the exemption clause as it appears in the bill:

(8) So much of the amount received by a person in the military or naval forces of the United States as salary or compensation in any form from the United States for services abroad or at sea in such forces as does not exceed $3,500.

That refers only to the salary or compensation for service when abroad, and for only the length of time that he is abroad. If a soldier is there for only one month he would have an exemption of his compensation received during that month. The gentleman exempts income from any other source.

He exempts not the soldier here, nor the soldier serving abroad, but the private or officer in the military or naval forces who has an income from any other source. There is not a lawyer here who would say I am mistaken in that construction. It can not have any other construction. The provision in the bill only exempts the salary that the Government is going to pay the man who is fighting abroad. Now the gentleman's amendment includes income from any source, received not by the man abroad, but the man in the military or naval forces. No man in this House intends or wants to do that. Now, another thing. My friend from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] and my friend from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] talk about the poor private and say that we have discriminated against the poor private in favor of the officer. What they want to do by this amendment is to put the poor private and officer on the same terms of equality as to exemption. What is it? It means they want to make a discrimination against the poor private whose income does not amount to the exemption of $1,000 if he is unmarried, or $2,000 if he is married, in favor of the rich private who has an income of not only the amount of what he gets for serving the Government, but whose income is thousands of dollars from other sources. Whoever heard of a poor private for whom these gentlemen are so solicitous having an income of $3,500 in addition to what the Government pays them? That is exactly what the amendment will do. If, by confining this to whatever the man gets not to exceed $3,500, you want to go further and help the poor private, when you exempt the rich private and put them on the same equality, you will have to provide for the giving to the poor private the difference between the rich private's exemption and the poor private's salary. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I was unavoidably absent from the House, having an engagement at the departments, when page 107 of the bill was read, and I would like unanimous consent to revert to that page and be allowed to offer an amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. What is the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. KAHN. It is an amendment——

Mr. KITCHIN. Let it be reported.

Mr. KAHN. I will ask the Clerk to read it.

The CHAIRMAN The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 107, line 13, after the word "distillery" insert a period and the following:

"Under such regulations as may be prescribed by the commissioner and approved by the Secretary, it shall be lawful to produce grape wines on bonded winery premises by the usual method of fermentation, and to transport and use the same, and like wines heretofore produced and now stored on bonded winery premises, as distilling material for the production of nonbeverage spirits in the production of nonalcoholic wines, containing less than one-half of 1 per cent alcohol by volume, in any fruit brandy or industrial distillery: Provided, That all alcoholic spirits so obtained at any industrial distillery shall be denatured, and all spirits so obtained at any fruit distillery shall be removed and used only for nonbeverage purposes or for denaturation."

Mr. KITCHIN. Reserving the right to object, from the reading of the amendment I take it that it proposes to give wine growers or wine makers the right that the beer makers have of extracting the alcohol from the wine and selling the resultant product as a nonalcoholic beverage?

Mr. KAHN. Exactly so; the right the beer makers have. It gives the same right to the wine makers.

Mr. STAFFORD. The beer makers do not have that right. It is forbidden by the President's proclamation.

Mr. KAHN. I mean in the law.

Mr. STAFFORD. And this will supersede the President's proclamation. I would like to have beer incorporated so as to permit near beer to be brewed.

Mr. KITCHIN. As I understand it the beer people, in order to make "bevo," or anything of that kind, make the beer and then extract the alcohol and make what is known as "bevo" or other nonalcoholic drinks. Does this amendment provide for a like treatment of wine?

Mr. KAHN. That is exactly it.

Mr. KITCHIN. The wine men will make wine and then extract the alcohol from it and make a nonalcoholic drink?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; a nonalcoholic drink.

Mr. KITCHIN. What does the department say about that?

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman will allow me, the department has drawn this amendment. I suggested an amendment of this kind in different language and submitted it to the department. They then drew this amendment, and said they were entirely in favor of it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will that help the grape growers out in California?

Mr. KAHN. It will help the grape growers considerably, because if they have wine on hand after the 1st of next July they can dispose of it in this way by using the wine for distilling purposes in order to make nonalcoholic wine.

Mr. KITCHIN. Can the beer men do that if they have beer on hand?

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to say, as far as beer is concerned——

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the President's proclamation does not stop beer on account of the food production, but because of the fuel which the brewers have to use.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not object to the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve the right to object——

Mr. SIMS. Then I object, if there is any further reservation about it. Let us vote on it.

Mr. STAFFORD. You can not vote if I object. I can reserve the right to object, and exercise that right.

The CHAIRMAN. That disposes of the matter——

Mr. SIMS. If we have a vote, I have no objection, of course.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield one minute, so that I may make an explanation?

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to answer the query propounded by the gentleman from North Carolina. He asked the gentleman from California whether the brewers of the country did not have the same privilege of manufacturing near beer out of stores of material now on hand.

I would say to the gentleman that this week and last week representatives of the brewers of Milwaukee called upon the Food Administrator, Mr. Herbert Hoover, in this city, and requested that they should be granted the privilege only to continue until the present malt now on hand could be utilized for the manufacture of near beer, not using any more fuel than is now allowed them for the manufacture of beer. That privilege was denied them. The Food Administration has taken that position as to near beer. It appeared a reasonable request, merely to continue to manufacture near beer from the present existing supply of malt. It was denied absolutely from and after December 1 next. Now, here you propose to single out and play favorites by legislation with an allied industry. We are going to have presently the prohibition amendment on the food-conservation bill under consideration, which absolutely forbids the further selling of wines and beer and near beer and alcoholic liquors after July next——

Mr. KITCHIN. While the right to make beer as they are making it now exists, or did exist, did not Congress last year give the beer people the same rights which the gentleman is now asking for the grape growers? The President can stop the operation of this provision whenever he deems it necessary. As long as they had the power to make beer and as long as they will have the right to make beer in the future Congress gave them the power and right to extract this alcohol from it and sell the resultant product as a nonalcoholic beverage. As I understand, the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is simply asking to give the grape growers or wine makers the same right which the beer people had before they were stopped from making beer.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the Food Administrator says that the great beer industry in this country shall not be privileged to use the supply of malt now on hand in the manufacture of near beer we should not go counter to his wishes in restricting the production of nonalcoholic beverages. The reasons for prohibiting the manufacture of near beer apply in the case of the manufacture of nonalcoholic wine beverages. For that reason I object.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I reserved the right on the first day the bill was before the House to return to page 5 and consider section 202, which was not read. The committee has been unable to agree upon any amendment to section 202, and I therefore ask that it be read and adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read section 202.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 202. That whenever in the opinion of the commissioner the use of inventories is necessary in order clearly to determine the income of any taxpayer, inventories shall be taken by such taxpayer upon such basis as the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may approve or prescribe as most clearly reflecting the income of the taxpayer.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this completes, I believe, the consideration of this revenue bill, and I want to say that in my opinion we have done a mighty good job. [Applause.] We have succeeded with a little more than 24 hours of actual debate, and with no amendment of major importance, in passing the mightiest taxation measure ever enacted by any peoples of the world. We are raising by this bill eight times the amount that it ever cost this Nation to live before in any one year. We are providing in this bill a sum of money equivalent to nearly one-third of the amount that it has cost this Nation to live from the first inauguration of George Washington down to the second inauguration of Woodrow Wilson. And we have done it, in my belief, without inflicting a burden upon wealth under which it can not at least stagger, and without taking from American industry that energy and initiative which it must necessarily possess if our war program is to be prosecuted to the limit.

I was delighted this morning to see a statement from the Secretary of the Treasury that in his judgment it would not be necessary to raise for this fiscal year more than $8,000,000,000 by taxes. This bill will raise $8,000,000,000, provided only that all the sources of taxation which it now contains shall not be diminished either by executive order or by legislation.

I have said that in my judgment we have not injured American industry. But, gentlemen, in my opinion we have come mighty near the danger mark. I think it of the highest significance that not an amendment was offered or suggested to raise any of the major taxes provided in the bill, which is an indication that the House agrees that we have reached the point in the taxing of industry and wealth beyond which it would be highly dangerous to go. And, therefore, if it shall happen that we are deprived of some of the revenue which this bill will raise we are then face to face with consumption taxes and we must be ready to meet that issue when it comes.

Now, gentlemen, as you all know, a consumption tax is not levied with any reference to the ability of the person taxed to pay that tax. This bill, with whatever faults it may have, is drafted upon the theory of taxing those who can best afford to pay. But the moment we get to consumption taxes we must abandon that theory, for, when we begin to tax coffee and cotton and men's overalls, then we come to the point when John Smith pays the same or more taxes on these things than John D. Rockefeller does. [Applause.] I say this to bring before you the suggestion that we might as well realize that from now on, and while political conditions prevent a more liberal resort to tariff duties, increased revenues must in the main be raised by consumption taxes.

We have but one formality to go through with before this bill becomes a law, in so far as this House is concerned. In a very few moments there will flash around the world the announcement that the Representatives of the American people have unanimously passed a bill carrying $8,000,000,000 in taxes to prosecute the war. [Applause.]

That will be welcome news to our brave allies, and, gentlemen, it will bring cold comfort to the Kaiser and his satellites. [Applause.] It will show conclusively to them that the heart of the American Nation is grimly set on carrying this thing through to the finish. [Applause.] It sends the best answer that the American Congress can send to the whining peace proposal of Austria [applause], because it shows, as some one has suggested, that we propose to do business, not with the tail of the dachshund, but with his head. And it is going to show that our final compact with the dachshund is to be made not when he is standing more or less firmly on four legs, but when sitting up on its hind legs, with tail between them, he begs for that mercy which he so ill deserves. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12863) to provide revenue, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not.

The SPEAKER. If any gentleman in the House is opposed to the bill, the Chair will recognize him to make a motion to recommit. If not, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The Clerk will report his motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to report the same forthwith with the following amendment: Page 171, line 20, after the word "evidence," insert the following:

"TITLE XIII.

"JOINT COMMITTEE ON WAR EXPENDITURES.

"SEC. 1204. That to cooperate with the President in promoting efficiency and preventing waste and extravagance in the conduct of the war with the Imperial Government of Germany a joint committee shall be appointed, composed of six Members of the Senate, including three Democrats and three Republicans, and seven Members of the House of Representatives, including three Republicans and four Democrats, to be known as the joint committee on war expenditures. The membership of such committee for the Senate shall be designated by the President of the Senate and for the House of Representatives by the Speaker thereof. Such committee shall sit during the sessions or the recesses of Congress, shall confer and advise with the President of the United States and the heads of the various executive departments on any or all matters relating to war expenditures, and shall make report to Congress from time to time, in its own discretion or when requested to do so by either branch of Congress. Such committee shall have power to act by subcommittee or otherwise and to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to employ such clerical, expert, and stenographic assistance as shall be necessary, and to pay the necessary expense of such committee there is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $100,000, to be paid out upon the audit and order of the chairman or acting chairman of said committee."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that it is not germane.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to report the same forthwith with the following amendment: On page 171, after line 20, insert the following:

"TITLE XIII.

"COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES.

"That a committee on the expenditure of the amounts and sums to be collected under the provisions of this act, with especial reference to the amounts to be so collected for war expenditures, be appointed for the purpose of investigating and reporting to the House what safeguards should be provided and what steps taken to prevent extravagance and waste in the expenditure of the money provided for in this act;

"Said committee to consist of 10 Members of the House to be appointed by the Speaker from the membership of the House, 5 of whom shall be selected from the majority and 5 from the minority of the House;

"And the said committee so appointed shall cooperate with, or act cojointly with a like committee of the Senate, if such committee shall be appointed."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that is not germane.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit that the point of order will not lie against this amendment.

The Chair has ruled on one or two occasions that the preceding amendment was not germane. This second amendment has been so written as to overcome that objection.

The rule upon which the Chair relied in sustaining the point of order against the first amendment was section 3 of Rule XXI, which provides that "no amendment shall be in order to any bill affecting revenue which is not germane to the subject matter in the bill." Not only did the distinguished Speaker apply that rule to the former amendment but two other parliamentarians, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] upheld the decision of the Speaker. But I respectfully submit that the amendment that is now before the House is germane and is not prohibited by the rule just quoted.

The bill now under consideration is "A bill to provide revenue, and for other purposes." The rule provides that no amendment shall be in order to any bill affecting revenue which is not germane to the subject matter in the bill. It is not a question of a paragraph, upon which the Chair seems to have relied heretofore.

This amendment relates to the subject matter of the bill, which is the raising of revenue and the disposition of the revenue when raised, an entirely new proposition, having no complications such as seemed to arise in the mind of the Chair with regard to the first amendment. I submit that this amendment is germane.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Rule!

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken, Mr. KITCHIN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 349, not voting 81, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following general pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. KETTNER with Mr. IRELAND.

Mr. TALBOTT with Mr. BROWNING.

Mr. DUPRÉ with Mr. FRANCIS.

Mr. VAN DYKE with Mr. PURNELL.

Mr. RANDALL with Mr. FOSS.

Mr. BELL with Mr. HICKS.

Mr. TAGUE with Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island.

Mr. ESTOPINAL with Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois.

Mr. ASWELL with Mr. FARR.

Mr. MAHER with Mr. GRAY of New Jersey.

Mr. OLIVER of New York with Mr. SWITZER.

Mr. DALE of New York with Mr. BRITTEN.

Mr. VINSON with Mr. MOTT.

Mr. LEA of California with Mr. MCKINLEY.

Mr. FERRIS with Mr. DALE of Vermont.

Mr. NICHOLLS of South Carolina with Mr. COOPER of Ohio.

Mr. WATKINS with Mr. STINESS.

Mr. HENSLEY with Miss RANKIN.

Mr. DENTON with Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania.

Mr. LINTHICUM with Mr. FESS.

Mr. DELANEY with Mr. GOULD.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. DENTON, is not here. I received a telegram from him stating that if he were here he would vote "aye."

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. GALLIVAN, of Massachusetts, has sent me a telegram that he can not be here, but if here he would vote "aye."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. VAN DYKE, has telegraphed that it is impossible for him to be here, but if present he would vote "aye."

Mr. RIORDAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to make the same announcement for my colleagues, Mr. DELANEY, Mr. DALE of New York, Mr. OLIVER of New York, and Mr. FLYNN. If present, they would vote for the bill.

Mr. HASKELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York, Mr. SIEGEL, is unavoidably absent, but if present he would vote "aye."

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. TALBOTT. I voted "aye." If he was present, I know he would vote the same way, and I will therefore let my vote stand.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with the gentleman from California, Mr. KETTNER. If he were present, he would vote in favor of the bill, and I will therefore let my vote stand.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. DALE, is at home on an errand to his constituents. If he were present, he would vote "aye."

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. PURNELL, has been called home on account of the illness of his mother. I have received a telegram from him stating that if present he would vote for the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I am authorized to say that if my colleague, Mr. KELLEY of Michigan, were present he would vote for the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, a great many Members are not present this afternoon. Several days ago I told gentlemen that we would probably finish the bill and vote on it Saturday. Some gentlemen have come in since the roll call began and are now present. I ask unanimous consent that those Members present in the House now who have come in since their names were called and did not answer be given the privilege of voting on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent, owing to the statement that he has made to Members heretofore, that all Members present who came in late may now be permitted to vote on the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. ROUSE, was suddenly called home on account of the death of his wife's mother. He has stated to me that if present he would vote for the bill.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. KITCHIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that there be read at this time by the Clerk a letter from Secretary Lane and one from a soldier, both of which pertain to legislation now in process providing homesteads for disabled soldiers, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideratoin of the bill H. R. 12714, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would ask if the gentleman will include in his request a provision for a discussion for some time to debate the provisions of the bill?

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from Minnesota desires 30 minutes on a proposition involved in the bill. As far as this side is concerned, I have had no requests for time, and I do not desire to use any myself. I shall, therefore, include in the request I make that the gentleman from Minnesota at the proper point in the bill be permitted to address the House on that point for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. He will have the absolute right of his own to address the House for one hour if he can catch the eye of the presiding officer.

Mr. LEVER. I am trying to obviate that.

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not desire more than 30 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry, and I will ask the gentleman from South Carolina if he will yield for that purpose?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would inquire whether the bill which the gentleman seeks unanimous consent to have considered at this time has been reported by the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. LEVER. It has not. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the bill for which I am asking present consideration is the Agricultural appropriation bill, which was vetoed by the President, with the vetoed part of the bill eliminated, with all other matters in the bill exactly as they were agreed to in the House and in the Senate and in conference. The conference report was adopted by both Houses.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the bill been reintroduced by the gentleman, so as to include all that portion of the bill which passed the House and the Senate, save the provision vetoed by the President?

Mr. LEVER. It has not been reintroduced. I am trying to save some printing and some time. The bill is engrossed, and I am following the precedent set by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] with the Post Office appropriation bill early in the session. I would say that I have authority from the Committee on Agriculture to take this course in this matter.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am seeking light as to the parliamentary status of the bill. The gentleman seeks to have the bill considered now, although it has not been introduced.

Mr. LEVER. I am introducing it now and asking for its present consideration.

Mr. STAFFORD. Virtually sending it to the Clerk's desk for introduction, and asking immediate consideration of the bill, with the exception of that portion which was vetoed by the President.

Mr. LEVER. That is correct.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. This bill has not been introduced. Since the 30th day of June, almost three months have elapsed. It seems to me, in view of the fact that the old appropriations have been continued—that is, for the last year from month to month—this bill ought to be considered in an orderly way and the House understand what it is passing when it does pass it.

Mr. LEVER. Let me say this to the gentleman. The same suggestion occurred to me some time ago, but the continuing resolutions that we have passed provide that the expenditures under them shall be for one-twelfth of the amount of expenditures during the months of July and August, and that any amount expended under the resolution shall be subtracted from the total amount of the appropriation carried in the bill. Now, it so happens that the very peak of the expenditures in the Department of Agriculture comes in the months of June, July, and August, for the reason that their field force are out in the field at this time, more largely so than at any other time in the year.

Mr. CANNON. Have they been out in the field for the past three months?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. By what authority?

Mr. LEVER. By the authority of the continuing resolutions. We passed two, the gentleman will remember.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the gentleman will let this bill go over until to-morrow.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well, gentlemen say, "Oh, no!" I think it ought to go over until to-morrow. The gentleman from Minnesota desires 30 minutes, some other Member of the House may desire something of time. I have no disposition unduly to obstruct the consideration of the bill.

Mr. LEVER. I would say to the gentleman from Illinois I am pressing this matter at this time not to accommodate myself, personally, because my family is here in Washington and I propose to stay here whether there is a recess or not, but a great many Members of the House have been very insistent in trying to get through with this bill and the bill containing the prohibition proposition in time that they may leave the city to-morrow night. Many of them would like to go to-night.

Mr. CANNON. What are gentlemen going to do about the $7,000,000,000 deficiency bill now under consideration?

Mr. LEVER. A statement was made this morning by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations thinks that that bill will hardly be ready for consideration in less than 10 days or two weeks.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. I will yield.

Mr. NORTON. Why is it this bill has not been considered by the Committee on Agriculture for the past two months?

Mr. LEVER. The bill has been considered by the committee in this way. The bill was brought to the attention of the committee one day last week—I think it was—and the committee authorized me to take the course I am pursuing this afternoon. I have been informed by the enrolling clerk that the bill, with the veto part of it out, has already been enrolled. Now, to reintroduce the bill not only means an expense for printing but it means the expenditure in time for reenrolling. I have talked to a number of Members, and they believe this is the best course to pursue in order to save that difficulty and that expense, because, as I say, the bill has been passed upon by the House and has been passed upon by the Senate, and this is exactly what the House has agreed to already. Of course I can reintroduce the bill this afternoon, call the committee to meet to-morrow morning, and report it; but it delays consideration until Monday, and I thought we could save time by pursuing this course.

Mr. NORTON. The section of the bill which has been stricken out is the section pertaining to the price of wheat?

Mr. LEVER. That is all.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Is this what is known as the emergency agricultural——

Mr. LEVER. No; this is the regular annual appropriation bill for the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BORLAND. It is not the bill that contains the so-called Gore amendment prohibiting the use of certain things in——

Mr. LEVER. No; that is contained in the bill which we propose to bring up immediately following this bill.

Mr. BORLAND. Now, will the bill which the committee has reported to the House—the emergency bill—contain the Gore amendment?

Mr. LEVER. The action of the committee in reference to the emergency bill has been this: The committee has recommended to the House that the House disagree to all Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate, and one of those amendments is the Gore amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. CANNON. Let us get that request again stated.

The SPEAKER. The request is for the present consideration of this bill, with the understanding that the gentleman from Minnesota is to be permitted to speak for 30 minutes.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I hope we can get up the bill in this way. I have an hour in my own right. I will yield the gentleman from Minnesota 30 minutes, and if there are any other gentlemen over there who desire some time I will yield up to within one minute of the one hour, when I shall move the previous question. Is that satisfactory?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the gentleman's program? To keep us here until midnight to pass these two bills?

Mr. LEVER. No. I will say to the gentleman very frankly that if I am permitted to pass this bill this afternoon I will move to rise.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is the only bill that will be considered to-night if this consent is granted?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman state what he will do with the prohibition bill to-morrow or Monday?

Mr. LEVER. I hope we will bring it up to-morrow. We can dispose of this bill in an hour and a half of time. There is nothing in controversy except this proposition.

Mr. BUTLER. And to-night you will not consider H. R. 11945?

Mr. LEVER. I will not if we may pass this bill. I am hoping to get this bill through, and then we will take up the other.

Mr. HAUGEN. As the gentleman knows, there have been several requests for time; and it seems to me before we agree to take this bill up under unanimous consent we should have some agreement as to the time for general debate.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, in view of that statement——

Mr. HAUGEN. I would suggest to the gentleman to couple with his request for unanimous consent that a certain time be agreed upon for general debate. And if the bill can not be disposed of this evening it will be in order to-morrow.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which is at the Clerk's desk, and pending that, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on that bill and all amendments thereto shall conclude in 1 hour and 30 minutes, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] to have 1 hour and I to control 30 minutes, at the end of which time the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and all amendments thereto.

The SPEAKER. What are you going to do about the rule as to a bill carrying appropriations being considered in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. LEVER. I include that, that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, whom will I look to for my time?

The SPEAKER. If it is considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole, there is no such thing as general debate.

Mr. LEVER. I am asking unanimous consent that I may have that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is asking unanimous consent for two things at once—that is, for the present consideration of the bill; and, in the second place, that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole, with an hour and a half debate. Is there objection?

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman take care of my time?

Mr. LEVER. I will.

Mr. NORTON. Will the bill be considered under the five-minute rule if unanimous consent is granted?

The SPEAKER. Here is the way of it: The first proposition is to consider it. He gets that. The second is to consider it in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. If that is granted you will get five-minute debate. Whoever the Chair recognizes gets five minutes. Now, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], after that, asks unanimous consent that the debate shall be general debate, and of that the gentleman from Iowa shall have an hour and he have 30 minutes, and at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. NORTON. How is that to be divided?

Mr. MADDEN. If consent is granted for the present consideration of this bill, with an hour and a half of general debate, and five minutes for each person who wishes to speak on an amendment, who knows how long debate will continue? Does anybody know that?

Mr. LEVER. I will say to my friend from Illinois that we have a pretty good idea of how many speeches are going to be made. I have absolutely no requests on this side, and I understand there is only a request on the other side by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

Mr. MADDEN. There may be amendments to the bill. No one knows. If the bill is going to be debated until 9 or 10 o'clock to-night, I do not think it ought to be taken up to-night.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of this bill to-morrow morning after these various speeches that have been allotted shall have been concluded. And I ask unanimous consent that the debate shall be continued for two hours, one hour and a half to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], and to be confined to the subject matter of the bill—no; I withdraw that—and thirty minutes to be controlled by myself, and that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and that at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that after the speeches arranged for to-morrow are concluded this bill shall be taken up and considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and that there shall be a general debate of two hours, one hour and a half to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] and thirty minutes by himself, and that at the end of two hours the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what is the objection on the part of the gentleman to considering this bill to-morrow in the usual way by the House resolving itself into Committee of the Whole?

Mr. LEVER. I do not object to it at all.

Mr. WALSH. Then I object to the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. LEVER. The only thing that the gentleman from Massachusetts desires is that the bill shall be considered to-morrow in the Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule in the regular way.

Mr. CANNON. Then is it proposed that we adjourn at once?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina renews his request for the provision that the bill shall be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; that it shall be considered to-morrow under the rules.

Mr. LEVER. Let it be considered in the regular way.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection to the gentleman's former request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws his objection to the former request of the gentleman from South Carolina. The former request was——

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I renew the objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota renews the objection.

Mr. LEVER. Then, Mr. Speaker, I renew my modified request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman modifies his request that the bill be considered tomorrow under the general rules of the House. Is there objection?

Mr. HAUGEN. How about an agreement as to general debate?

The SPEAKER. If it is considered under the general rules of the House it will be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SABATH. Under the five-minute rule?

The SPEAKER. No; not under the five-minute rule in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Anybody can speak who gets recognition.

Mr. LEVER. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the Chair put the first request, and then I will try to secure a limiting of the general debate.

The SPEAKER. The first request is that this bill shall be in order to-morrow after the speeches are made. Is there objection?

Mr. WEBB. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask my friend from South Carolina one question. I understand it is his purpose to bring up, immediately after the Agricultural appropriation bill, which is now pending before the House to be disposed of, the extension Agricultural bill carrying war-time prohibition. Is that a fact?

Mr. LEVER. That is true; yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. There is no bill before the House.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. LEVER. I am trying to get one before the House by this unanimous-consent request. I am trying to make it in order to-morrow.

Mr. CANNON. Then the gentleman will introduce his bill, so that we will have it.

Mr. BUTLER. Under the rules of the House.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] or any other gentleman desires the bill to be reintroduced, I will introduce it, but I am trying to save the expense of the reengrossment of the bill and the expense of introduction and printing. That is all. There is no other purpose in view.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SWIFT. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects. The bill is considered as introduced and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. LEVER. Then, Mr. Speaker, I give notice that I will call up this bill to-morrow morning.

We have another bill here, concerning which I would like to get the temper of the House as to what it desires to do.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York withdraws his objection. Is there objection to this bill being made the order of the House for to-morrow after the speeches are concluded?

Mr. McFADDEN. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman if this means the rereading of that bill?

Mr. LEVER. Oh, it will have to be read; yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. That will consume nearly all day.

Mr. LEVER. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not permit any bill to go through here without being read. That would be bad practice. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Now, I ask unanimous consent that the general debate on this bill to-morrow shall proceed for two hours, one hour and 30 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] and 30 minutes by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that the general debate on this bill be confined to two hours, an hour and a half to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] and 30 minutes by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. BUTLER. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman how much speech making there is to be to-morrow before that bill is taken up?

Mr. LEVER. I understand two hours.

Mr. BUTLER. And two hours on this bill will make four.

Mr. LEVER. Yes. We can finish this bill to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire whether it is the purpose of the gentleman to bring up to-morrow any other bill except this?

Mr. WEBB. There is the war-time emergency Agricultural bill, including prohibition, which will come up immediately after.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object, if the gentleman will not be given an opportunity to answer.

Mr. LEVER. I desire to answer the gentleman's question.

The SPEAKER. Yes; but three or four gentlemen demanded the regular order.

Mr. BUTLER. I suggest to the gentleman that he give notice that on Monday he will call up that bill——

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, a great number of gentlemen have expressed themselves as desiring to dispose of the food-production bill, which contains in it war-time prohibition. Personally, I am in no very great hurry about that matter, because, as I said a moment ago, my family is here and I do not intend to go home. Some gentlemen desire to leave to-night, and a great many more desire to leave to-morrow night. If the order is carried through which has just been agreed to for taking up the Agricultural appropriation bill to-morrow, it will take practically all day to dispose of it. If gentlemen of the House desire to take up the emergency food bill to-night and dispose of it, I will call it up.

Mr. CANNON. But my friend said to me that when this agreement was made a motion to adjourn would be in order.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman might ask unanimous consent to take it up, and see whether anybody objects.

Mr. LEVER. Suppose we submit the question to the House?

Mr. MADDEN. That is not fair, when there has been an agreement.

Mr. DYER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Was there any agreement as to taking up that bill? The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] objected.

The SPEAKER. That objection was to the fixing of a limit for general debate. And, anyway, the gentleman can call the bill up whenever he gets ready.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 11283. An act to amend and reenact sections 4, 11, 16, 19, and 22 of the act approved December 23, 1913, and known as the Federal reserve act, and sections 5208 and 5209, Revised Statutes.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, September 21, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Postmaster General submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation, required by the Post Office Department for additional clerical force for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1283); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Superintendent of the State, War, and Navy Department Building submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the State, War, and Navy Department Building for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1284); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, submitting suggestion regarding amendment of H. R. 12860, a bill granting to the Army Nurse Corps and the Navy Nurse Corps pay and allowances during any period of involuntary captivity by the enemy of the United States (H. Doc. No. 1285); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

By Mr. DILL: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 332) to authorize the President in time of war to supervise, take possession, and assume control of any fire department of any incorporated city in the United States, and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war, and to provide just compensation therefor; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. MERRITT: A bill (H. R. 12977) to authorize the President of the United States to reappoint Seth William Scofield major of Cavalry; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WALSH: A bill (H. R. 12978) granting a pension to Hodges W. Drayton; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12979) granting a pension to Luther F. Thayer; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12980) granting an increase of pension to William Johnson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. DARROW: Memorial of the Philadelphia Board of Trade opposing legislation preventing the resale of Government bonds and favoring exemption of Government bonds from all taxation up to $30,000 of each issue; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: Petition of the Prairie Club of Chicago, favoring the bill to establish the Grand Canyon National Park; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. LINTHICUM: Petition of I. & M. Ottenheimer, of Baltimore, Md., protesting against the 2-cent postage rate on postal cards; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. RAKER: Protests of F. S. & F. B. Ackerman, of Yreka, and of the Portola Drug Co., of Portola, Cal., against the tax on nonbeverage alcohol for medical use; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, resolutions of the Anchorage (Alaska) Chamber of Commerce in re the mining the coal fields of Alaska; to the Committee on the Territories.
